When a Bella Coola speaks of the fear which kusiut dances cause the uninitiated, he almost invariably cites in order the Cannibal, Scratch, and Breaker dances. Kukusiut with these three prerogatives have no more privileges than other members of the society, nor are they considered superior in rank, but similarity in their functions leads to an almost automatic association. If questioned further, a Bella Coola will usually say that he regards the Cannibal dance to be first, with the Scratch and Breaker equal, but less important. Breakers share with Cannibals and Scratchers the prerogatives of not blackening their faces; of having as theme for their songs the land 575* 796* 424 [781] [554] [302] [533] [264] elaborate myths dealing with the origin of the kusiotem dances. They believe that they are performed by the supernatural beings in the land above, and that long, long ago Ałquntäm and his associates held a meeting at which it was decided to send them down to mortals. They chose as recipient a certain Onixwałtcua of Kimsquit, and the prerogative of giving kusiotem dances has since been possessed by the owner of that name.[44] The following accounts are of the dances performed by a certain Onixwałtcua whom it will be convenient to call X. He has six repositories, one for each section of his dance.

As with all other kusiut prerogatives, the impetus to dance can come only on receipt of a call from a supernatural patron, the being Kułsłkäkmidjut in the case of all kusiotem dancers. The uninitiated are told that a call "falls" on the recipient, and moreover that for kusiotem dances it can take place only when the supernatural beings are rushing out of the house above on the entry of the sun at the winter solstice. Thus kusiotem dances should take place after the winter solstice, although this requirement has not been enforced in recent years.

The Stomach-Cutting Dance

In the early summer X decides to exercise his prerogative the following winter. He informs one of the marshals of his wish, and the latter summons his associates to the secret meeting-place where the matter is debated at length. Danger of exposure of details to the uninitiated is so great that the marshals refuse permission for the performance unless the would-be dancer is a man of proved reliability. Once this consent has been obtained, X quietly proceeds with his preparations, laying in supplies of food and asking his kusiut friends for their assistance. When the dances begin, X attends as do all other kukusiut, though his secret mental excitement increases as the time draws near for him to perform. The exact time of starting is discussed with the marshals, and a prelimi-

[44] There are other kusiotem dancers in Bella Coola.

*575 his follower on earth can do the same. The ritual of nebusam
*796 of a Thunder dancer is accordingly identical with that of a 424 Mystery dancer. In the field an effort was made to obtain [776] accounts of what had actually occurred at dances rather than of what should have happened; at the dance of Mystery, previously described, several of the usual features were omitted, and these were accordingly left out of the account. They will now be mentioned in connection with the dance of Thunder, but the fact must be emphasized that they belong equally to all kusiut rites in which the dancer has the prerogative of showing all supernatural beings, including Thunder.

[551] In Kimsquit the name of the kusiut having the prerogative of singing of Thunder signifies, "The Roarer," with reference to his patron. The native term could not be learnt. It will be convenient to refer to the dancer as X.

*575 The Thunder dance is of the normal kusiut type in every *796 respect, so no account need be given of the ceremonial of the 776 first three days. Many masks are ordered on the night of nusiutälsap and these are ready early on nebusam. During that day the expectant uninitiated are excited to see the masked figure of Ano°likwolsaix emerge from X's house, accompanied by a throng of kukusiut who chase all but members of the society back to their homes. Following them comes Thunder's herald, Ałxwolätnum, calling on all to prepare to come to the dance of Thunder, the leading kusiut of the supernatural beings. This messenger circles Sonx°' to summon the supernatural ones to Thunder's dance, the reason that all can be shown at X's ceremonial. Immediately behind Ałxwolätnum comes Ṭłoqots, the Defamer, protesting that Thunder's dance is not worth attending since he, and he alone, is the senior kusiut of the supernatural ones. Ano°likwolsaix adds her usual comments to the remarks of the two masked figures. This series of invitations and counter-invitations is repeated four times during the day, to the wonder of the uninitiated who peer out through chinks in the houses and around corners of the buildings. Sometimes Ałxwolätnum and Ṭłoqots pass from tune previously described. To the Bella Coola philosopher, apparently no explanation is needed of the manner in which Saiks was allowed to use his experience as the basis of a kusiut dance. The assumption is that he was a kusiut at the time of his experience, although this is not clearly stated. The last to use the name died about 1910, each Saiks having had the prerogative of giving the Thunder dance.

THE GHOST DANCE[91]

Among the numerous patrons of kusiut dancers are Ghosts. The term, äskankots, applied to a shaman whose power is derived from a ghost, is also applied to kusiut with one as patron, but the two functionaries must not be confused. It is a fairly common prerogative and there are Ghost dancers in every village, their right depending in every case on some experience of an ancestor with a ghost. The following is an account of the manner in which Soptos of Tcimotl performed his ritual; it may be regarded as typical of all, and the dancer can be referred to as X.

At any time during the ceremonial season X consults with the marshals to decide upon a suitable time for his performance. On the evening preceding, normally the qotlim of some other kusiut, the marshals state that his call is imminent; X makes his final arrangements and asks the assistance of a number of his fellows.

When the nebusam rites of the following evening have been completed and the uninitiated have returned to their own houses, they are startled to hear whistling from the forest near at hand. It is not the instrumentally produced sound that accompanies the coming of a call, but tuneless whistling with the mouth; everyone knows that this is the language of ghosts. A visitation from them is by no means unknown, and always dreaded, so at once there is excitement and everyone cowers in the bedrooms. Presently heralds go through the village

During the rest of the ceremonial season X becomes mad at intervals and displays his insanity by rushing to every house and throwing dirt and sand. His kukusiut escort is always with him, and the procedure is identical with that already [424] recorded. X makes no recompense for the damage inflicted, so it is probable that his fellows do not regard his dance as an unmitigated pleasure, but nothing can be done to deter him from exercising his prerogative.

THE DANCE OF THE SUPERNATURAL CHARMER

*575 *796 776 Although the Bella Coola are probably as moral as members of any other tribe, they enjoy humour of an obscene nature, and a dance which never fails to provide amusement is that of [522] the Supernatural Charmer. The patron of this is Sximsximdt, [831] a beautiful, unmarried, feminine being who is also termed Aliqmän·i and Nuxkmälsaix. She is thought to disregard the efforts of her supernatural relatives to restrain her, and comes to this earth where she bestows her favours not only on human beings, but on animals. Her protégé at Kimsquit is a young [557] man, Łälaiuks, at Bella Coola, a young woman, Kwaläkmus; [562] like all other kusiut names these can be used either by men or [424] women. It is said that Łälaiuks's prerogative is derived from the experience of an ancestor in past ages, whereas that of Kwaläkmus was initiated three generations ago by a very powerful chief. The ritual in each case is identical, so the dancer [533] can be referred to as X. Each has the prerogative of singing [532] not only of Sximsximdt, but also of the being known as Winwintumak. Many masks are required at the nebusam of either of these beings, so it is customary for X to perform with respect to Sximsximdt one year, and to Winwintumak at the next or a subsequent ceremonial season, though the actual songs always refer to both patrons.

*796 *575 When X wishes to dance he consults the marshals, obtains their consent, and then makes final arrangements on, normally,

*575 *796 but a proud and energetic dancer sometimes repeats a ceremony three or four times. [424]

THE SUN DANCE[34]

[776] [821] One of the forms in which Ałquntäm appears is that of the Sun, and in that case he is referred to as Sinxälotla. Considering the importance of this deity, it is rather surprising that the kusiut dance of which he is patron is not more impressive. Efforts were made to obtain full details of the ceremonial from several informants, but only a number of incidents and a bare [124] outline could be obtained. In part this was due to the fact that none of the informants[35] were themselves protégés of Ałquntäm, but this is not in itself sufficient to explain the comparative unimportance of the dance, since full accounts were obtained of other rituals from those who did not own them.

Nothing was learnt of the origin of any of the Sun dance [424] prerogatives, except that ancestors of the owners obtained them from Ałquntäm. It is a common right, and kukusiut having [551] Ałquntäm as patron are found in every village, among them being Qoxolän·i of Tcmotl, and Nexnexliwalaix of Nusqalst. As far as could be ascertained, the ritual of various Sun dance performances is identical, so one account will suffice and the dancer can be termed X.

Like other kusiut dancers, X can perform at any time during the ceremonial season, subject to the approval of the marshals. The call comes to him in the normal manner, the uninitiated are expelled, and the kukusiut gather in his house to practise the songs which the singers have just composed. The theme [533] is of Ałquntäm, describing his manifold functions, and particu- [776] larly that of guiding the Sun. The following day a second song with similar theme is composed, and in the evening the tasks are allotted for the manufacture of masks. Four are required; a large one representing Ałquntäm himself, one of [532]

[34]Needless to say, no connection or similarity is implied with the dance of the same name in other areas.

the one that takes place at a thunder-storm, is said to "make good the path" of the patron. It would formerly have been a very serious offence for a Sun dancer not to perform at an eclipse; his failure would probably have been punished with death by the marshals. One informant vividly recalled his fears when he failed to perform at an eclipse soon after his conversion to Christianity, and reiterated that he had been in deadly peril from the marshals in spite of the white man's law.

THE MOON DANCE

The Sun is not the only heavenly body that acts as patron to kusiut dancers, the Moon also has many human protégés. Among them is Nuhwimäx, "The Moon When It Is Unobscured," of Tcmotl, from whom the following account of the Moon dance was obtained. As usual, he can be spoken of as X.

776 551 424

The Moon dance can take place at any time during the ceremonial season, subject, of course, to X's wishes and the consent of the marshals. The coming of the call is heralded in the usual manner and the kukusiut presently assemble to learn the song just composed. It describes the following supernatural beings:

Asiutänem:[11] A woman who lives in the moon and who can be seen in certain of its phases, always carrying a bucket of water.

575* 796*

The two Aiqwaiust: These two beings are able periodically to blacken the Moon's face, thus causing an eclipse.

821 776

The two Snitsmän·a:[12] These kindly women clean the Moon's face after it has been blackened. It is these beings who come to earth to assist stricken kukusiut.

The song also describes how no supernatural being dares to pass the Moon's house during an eclipse, a prohibition similar to that obeyed by uninitiated with regard to passing outside a house where a kusiut ceremony is taking place.

[11] Asiutänem is the usual term for ghost; no reason was given for the application of the same designation to the woman living in the moon.

[12] There is difference of opinion among the Bella Coola as to whether or not there is more than one of these beings.

[The Moon Dance]

*575 No detailed description is needed for the ceremonial on *796 either nuxiutálxap or qotlm. On the evening of the former day 821 the masks are ordered; one for Asiutánem, who appears to be [532] confused with the Moon itself, one for each Aiqwaiust, one for each Snitsmán-a, and one for Ano'líkwolxaix.

Late in the afternoon the kukuxiut assemble in X's house to see that everything is in good shape. A large mat has been [532] spread across the back wall of the house and on it a disk representing the Moon, with a human face in the middle. After the usual discussion the uninitiated are called in. Each Snitsmán-a remains standing alone in the two back corners of the house, while the two Aiqwaiust are in the central space behind the fire, constantly waving their arms to and fro. Suddenly the Moon itself appears against the matting. A carpenter, concealed behind the screen, directs its course so that it moves in a short arc across the background and disappears; Ano'líkwolxaix explains to the uninitiated that this is the track of the new Moon, low down on the horizon. A second time it "rises," and moves across in a longer and higher curve, which Ano'líkwolxaix says is the longer orbit of the waxing Moon. On its third course it is still higher, and on its fourth appearance it moves across the full width of the house near the roof, which Ano'líkwolxaix describes as the course of the full Moon, far above the mountains. She also explains that we are indebted to Snitsmán-a for cleaning the Moon's face after the Aiqwaiust have blackened it, as otherwise no light would be visible. This ends the spectacle; the uninitiated are sent away, and the ceremonial concludes in the manner already described.

This constitutes the Moon dance as practised during the ceremonial season, but in addition X is required to dance whenever his patron is hidden by an eclipse. On such occasions the ritual is identical with that described for an eclipse of the Sun.

names for his only son. Becoming surfeited with this form of greatness, he decided to initiate a ḵwaiat ceremonial for his child. At that time chiefs were so powerful that they could create their own repositories, and Ałkumasalc resolved to make his son's in his own house. To give strength to it, he dug a hole and buried alive in it a female slave with her small infant. The unfortunate woman was a member of the tribe known to the Bella Coola as Tsawâł, probably a branch of the Haida; like all other northern tribeswomen she wore in her lower lip a plug of abalone-shell. Ałkumasalc also buried in the hole a large number of the wasps which abounded in his house. The uninitiated were told that the woman had chanced to stumble upon a repository and had become ḵulał, "rendered incapable of returning"; from this circumstance she was henceforth known as Ałnałululaix. The ḵulałaiat also informed non-members that the woman had been made immortal, and was forever to remain as a "live" in the repository. Ałkumasalc chose the name Ḵespâtus, "Sharp-Nosed," for his son, a reference to the sharp beaks of the numerous ravens shown on every object in his house. This designation has since been transmitted in the usual manner; every owner has had the right to perform a dance with the buried woman as patron.

In describing the ritual it will be convenient to refer to Ḵespâtus as X. 575* 796*

When X wishes to dance he obtains permission from the marshals and makes his preliminary plans in the customary way. A suitable date for the coming of the call is chosen, and, on the night preceding, the weeping of Ałnałululaix is heard in the forest behind the village. The weeper is one of X's associates, but no uninitiated would be reckless enough to venture near. She moves down the valley, as if coming from the repository near the village of Stuix. The next evening X receives his call and the uninitiated are expelled from his house. The dancer blackens his face, puts on a ceremonial collar, and goes out alone to find the slave woman; presently he returns, leading Ałnałululaix by the hand. She is disguised as an old, old woman, clad in rags and carrying on her back a bundle made to represent a small infant; over her face is a mask with a plug of abalone-shell in the lower lip (see Plate 12).* She slowly circles the fire, weeping bitterly, while the ḵulałaiat [532]

This ceremony is an example of the great diversity in kusiut dances. Instead of the usual patron in the land above, the slave woman is considered to be definitely located on this earth, at a spot near Staux. Moreover, the call comes through her actual appearance. The writer would have liked to learn further details of the dance, but they were unobtainable. 575* 796*

THE DANCE OF THE OTTER

Since every Bella Coola has, at the present time, some sort of kusiut dance, it would have been possible to collect the details of a large number. Only the main outlines of the dances which follow were obtained, but it is hoped that the complexity of those already described will suffice to explain the scope of the kusiut society. In some cases the details were omitted to save time, in other cases the informant was ignorant of them. The latter reason is responsible for the sketchiness of the Otter dance. [424]

This ritual is the prerogative of a Swalsli kusiut, Xwodjw·i, "The Crash," a name which refers to the din when the first Sony collapsed in the beginning of time. Presumably one of Xwodjw·i's ancestors was present at the fall and chose the name in consequence. The dancer's patron is the land otter, but the connection between this animal and the name has been forgotten, as the father of the performer frankly admitted. He suggested that probably one of his ancestors remembered having seen an otter before coming to this world, and chose it as patron for a dance which he instituted with respect to the name Xwodjw·i. It will be convenient to refer to the dancer as X. 575* 796* 424 551

X can perform at any convenient period during the ceremonial season. When the call comes, the ritual of the first three days follows normally, except that the songs used are supposed to have been unaltered. Before nakwaw the carpenters prepare a dummy otter, using a skin stretched over a wooden framework. A long rope is fastened to this and the figure thrown into the water so that it sways to and fro 575* 796* [593]

below a rapids. Care is taken that the uninitiated do not observe these arrangements. About noon on sakaam the heralds go to every house with a cry:

"Come to watch the hamat catch the supernatural one in the river."

The uninitiated are wise enough to remain within their houses as the hahamat troop down to the bank of the river. Presently X appears, clad in the usual ceremonial costume. In he dives, as if in pursuit of the dark shape which can be seen swirling to and fro in the water. Non-members, watching from the background, are amazed to see what appears to be a struggle, followed by the emergence of X clutching an otter in his arms. They are too far away to perceive that it is merely a dummy, nor do they know that a hamat has assisted the performer by cutting the rope at the proper time. As X reaches shore with his burden the hahamat women drum. Forcing his way through the throng of his associates, the performer goes to his house where the uninitiated presently hear the frenzied beating of sticks repeated four times. The dummy is carefully concealed in the back-room so that it can be used if necessary on a later occasion.

As X comes ashore, water is splashed in all directions from the dummy and often dampens several of the hahamat. Anyone to whom this happens is expected to give his clothes to a herald, and a man of chief-like disposition never hesitates to do so; in fact, he welcomes this opportunity of displaying his generous nature.

It is probable that a number of masked figures appear on the evening of sakaam, but detailed information is lacking. It might be added that a question as to whether the catching of this otter had any influence on the ability of X as an otter hunter was regarded by the informant as highly humorous.

THE OTTOPIS DANCE

In the beginning of time Sinaxoit of Kimsquit married a Bella Bella woman who brought as part of her dowry a hamat dance with Ocuqun as patron. This was first used by Lalqnem-i, a relative of Sisuqutl, and has since been the prerogative of the owner of the name, whom it will be convenient to term X. Being of foreign origin, there is no repository at Kimsquit; in fact, there is none even in Bella Bella itself where the kwaxa society is believed to lack both localized power and ancestral authority. The Ocuqun dance is thus the only one without a repository; so far as could be learned it is not performed in Bella Coola. In Bella Bella the original rite was connected both with the nusad and kwaxa organizations, but in Kimsquit with the latter alone.

When X wishes to dance, which may be at any time during the ceremonial season, he consults the marshals and picks a suitable date. As this draws near, the carpenters are requested to make an ocuqun, sometimes using a seal skin as basis. On the day that the call comes, the dummy is placed in the water of the fiord, close to shore. Suddenly the heralds raise the cry that a supernatural being is coming to X; the assembled uninitiated flee from his house and the kwaxa assemble. Presently the dancer rushes forth, followed by a band of his fellows, and plunges into the water. From a distance non-members can see arms and legs flying to and fro, blood flows as the kwaxa struggling in the shallows strike each other's noses, and they have no hesitation in believing the heralds who report that a fight is taking place with a watching ocuqun. X at last leaves his heavy sabers, amid the drooning of the women.

That night the uninitiated are called to X's house where the dummy ocuqun, guarded by the dancer and several other kwaxa, is placed behind the fire. Hidden strings have been fastened to its arms so that it moves and seems to be alive. One of the ocuqun takes a horn and blows three, ocuqun, and all the kwaxa call out i-oo. This is repeated four times, accompanied, on the last repetition, by the return of the ocuqun whence it came. This is done by pulling the body from sight, but of course the uninitiated do not know this. A source of awe to the uninitiated, who marvel that a man can still appear like an ordinary mortal when he has just brought a supernatural visitor home. According to one informant who, however, is not well posted on Sacrier matters, there is neither quiet nor seclusion, and Dark-Shade is merely sent away after four days. This may be the case, but the dance has not been carried out for many years, and the man frankly admitted that he did not know the details. It seems more likely that there is some kind of ceremony, since a song would not be composed unless for a definite purpose.

The coming of Dark-Shade complicates the Sacrier ceremonial since a number of dancers receive their calls simultaneously. In this case the ritual is carried out in unison which requires, for example, the composition of one song for each performer on Sacrieum. Calls never come in this way to dancers with important or complicated prerogatives, but it is a useful means of dealing with those whose right is merely to sing of their patrons. On sacrieum the patrons of all are displayed, a method which has the advantage of producing a dramatic effect which would be lacking if only one were in evidence. The coming of a call by means of Dark-Shade is called nulendimat, "Emerging from Below to Their Sight." Another time when several calls may come simultaneously to different Sakacier is at the winter solstice when, on the story of Alpoxiow, the supernatural beings rush forth and some of them fall, causing calls to come to their human protégés.

THE DANCE OF THE STONE MAN

Tsyakmpl, the man who was provided with his Ocean Lake wife and four children at the beginning of time, is patron for a Kimsquit Sacrier man named Kmoots. His repository is just above high-water mark on the east side of Dean Channel, about five miles from its head, and about one hundred and fifty feet north of the legal fishing boundary. This is almost immediately opposite Tsyakmpl's station. The repository is beneath the ground, and its doorway is a beaver which became petrified and which can still be seen, with its head facing the water.

The preliminaries of Kwaxa's dance do not differ from those already described, although it is uncertain whence comes the actual call. A large number of masks are constructed, as well as a huge wooden figure of the Stone Man himself, and smaller ones of his wife and four children. When the uninitiated are called in on the night of sakwam they see the Stone Man and his family standing behind the fire, while the body of the house is filled with a number of masked figures. The latter keep shouting to the Stone Man and he answers them, as he does mortals who pass his station on Dean Channel. The marshals always arrange that he does not reply to one of the masked figures, whereupon the others gibe at this unfortunate and tell him that he will die within a year. It is common knowledge that if the Stone Man does not answer the hail of a passer-by, the latter will soon die. The uninitiated are impressed to find that supernatural beings share this belief.

THE FIRE DANCE

This dance is the prerogative of a hamat named Wai:, "Coho Salmon." Its origin is attributed to the experience of an ancestor of the dancer who was helped by, and received his name from, one of these fish. Only a fragment of the ritual could be learned, enough to show that it has many points of resemblance with hamatsa rites. When Wai: performs, the central fire is raked apart and he appears to lie down on the ashes between the two flaming sections; evergreen boughs and sand are thrown over him, and the fire drawn together over his body. After an hour or more, when the uninitiated imagine he must be baked, his singing is heard, and Wai: walks in through the front door. Deception is practised probably by means of a dummy fastened with deer tendons which contract with the heat so that it seems as if the body itself were writhing. It is said that the first Wai: was actually able to perform this feat by means of the power given him by the salmon,

*575 but the kukuxiut all understand that later performances by *796 those with the same name are only possible with the assistance of carpenters. This dance has not been carried out for so many years that the details have been forgotten.

THE DANCE OF THE BIRDS

*575 The Bella Coola notice that in autumn many of the birds
*796 disappear, to be seen no more until spring. Ignorant of a warmer climate to the south and of the causes of migration, 825 they explain the phenomenon by saying that Ālquntām collects [776] the birds in some mysterious place for the winter and releases them in the spring. It is believed that he does the same with supernatural birds in the land above. The setting free of the [424] birds, which is in effect a scattering, is known as nusqwekotl
[551] and is personified; he is the patron of a kusiut named Qweta.
[592] For the enhancement of this man's dance a huge circular cage containing wooden birds is constructed. By means of a regular maze of hidden strings they are made to "fly," to the extreme amusement of the uninitiated. This is one of the most complicated kusiut rites. Contrary to the usual practice, no eagle down is used for fear that it might settle on the strings and betray their existence to the spectators.

THE DANCE OF DARKNESS AND SLEEP

*796 The patron of this dance is a being who has the power of bringing nightfall, and later, sleep. In accordance with his 776 double function, a dual personality is attributed to him. In 821 fact, he is almost two beings; as Sinqlominit, "Darkness," he [518] causes night to come once every twenty-four hours, whereupon

THE DANCE OF THE WHIRLWIND

Whirlwinds, though of rare occurrence in British Columbia, are known to the Bella Coola who believe that they are caused by the being Sculiaxmaxm. Like all supernatural creatures,

Whirlwind usually remains in the land above but sometimes visits this earth. He is patron for a kusiut who displays a mask representing him in characteristic form, the design of which is said never to vary. 575* 796* 776 [821] [532]

THE DANCE OF THE EARTHQUAKE

The Bella Coola believe that an earthquake is caused by the earth slipping very slightly from the grasp of Sninia. This being is patron for certain kukusiut and whenever a tremor occurs, his protégés call their associates and a dance is held. This may, of course, be at any season, and the ritual during spring or summer is identical with that described for dancers whose patrons are Thunder, the Sun, or the Moon. The theme of the song is of the manner in which Sninia performs his function of holding the world. A call from Sninia may also come in the normal manner to one of his protégés during the ceremonial season, but the ritual is of the usual type and merits no special description. In Kimsquit, Sninia is patron to a kusiut named Ällibaläxlaix. [823] [533] [551]

THE DANCE OF TIDE-MEASURER

The height to which the tides shall rise is decided by a male supernatural being, Mintlato·snim, "Tide-Measurer." He is patron of a kusiut named Tsäl, whose repository is near Sätlia. One of Tsäl's ancestors brought the rite with him from above in the beginning of time. The songs used at the dance describe how Tide-Measurer uses a stick in deciding how far the waters shall rise. During the day of nuhusam the uninitiated are told to go to their houses but, by peering round the corners and through chinks, as they always do, they are able to see a masked figure walk into the ocean, and thrust down to the bottom a stick which he carries. This is repeated four times during the day. [823] [551] [778] [533]

THE DANCE OF THE SUPERNATURAL BULL-HEAD

Since any supernatural being can act as patron to kusiut dancers, and since all mammals and birds are, in a sense, super- [825]

There are other traditions, probably with an historical basis, describing conflicts with the a'alk. The Bella Coola say that long, long ago there were not enough kusiut names for more than the old people to be admitted to the society, and that though members were regarded as having supernatural powers, yet the a'alk, confident in their numbers and strength, used frequently to assail the supremacy of the kukusiut. On one occasion, when the latter had prepared an elaborate feast of smoked goat flesh for themselves, the a'alk collected their weapons and demanded a share of the feast. The kukusiut, furiously angry, felt compelled to yield, though later they took revenge through the destruction wrought by many Cannibals and Scratchers when frenzied. It is said that even recently if the kukusiut did not invite the a'alk to one of their dances, they were always careful to placate them by sending half of the food as a present. 575* 578 173 [424] [551] [431]

Sometimes the a'alk, collectively, were bold enough to kill a kusiut, particularly if something had gone amiss in a dance house. Or other motives might be strong enough to outweigh respect for a member of the society. On one occasion a chief, who was not a member of the society, was told that his wife, who was, had been in the habit of prowling off at night with a Cannibal. The jealous husband prepared his bear-spear and slew the Cannibal when next he entered his house during a frenzied rampage of the village. Kukusiut, both from that village and others in the vicinity, combined to cause the murderer's death with the aid of a member of the society who was a professional killer. 575* 578 682

Success did not always come to the kukusiut in quarrels between members of the two societies. Long ago, the a'alk were invited to a gothw in a village in the upper Bella Coola valley. One of their own dances was taking place, but they 575* 578 796*

Nusäxkämx Songs

The texts of nusäxkämx songs are fragmentary and unsatisfactory. The rites in which they were used have long been discontinued and, since they were never ceremonially important, there was nothing to impress either tunes or words on the minds of the singers. In addition, it is probable that the songs were always less carefully constructed than those of other types. 533* [796]

Song Used for Qalon(a), a Kimsquit Man(b)

Qisänaowitsiya	sihmsiänäkcistsiya	sätwimmlnndai
Be happy,	ye people,	it is about to come,
dässulnyumdai	dsqolonlaotsaiya
that hidden one(c),	Beaver.

[WORDLESS CHORUS]

Qalonl'i	Qalonl'i	wa·nai·yai
Beaver(d)!	Beaver!	wa·nai·yai(e).

(a) This word means "Beaver." It is most unlikely that it was the dancer's own designation, more probably a nickname used in connection with the nusäxkämx rite. [551]
(b) Recorded as song VII D 9b, National Museum of Canada; singer, Louie Hall.
(c) This signifies a person who is hidden ceremonially, such as a hamat dancer who has gone to the land above. The dancer expected to be a Cannibal and the rite in which this song was used served as a kind of rehearsal. [796] [575]
(d) This refrain replaces a second and third part of the song itself.
(e) A meaningless series of choral ejaculations.

Song Used for a Kimsquit Woman(a)

Äxnuydimqudaks	äupiwcsudax	tupwiimqoskidax	ähusmäskidax
They heard	of Fawn(b),	when they were playing	long ago(c).

(a) Recorded as song VII D 9d, National Museum of Canada; singer, Jim Pollard.
(b) The theme being of a fawn, the dancer wore a deer-skin. [535]
(c) As in many nusäxkämx songs, the words refer to an ancient story, probably one describing the adventures of deer and wolves; see vol. II, p. 488.

Song Used for W'anäqslain, a Kimsquit Man(a)

Läläwmäsänämx	wawanyäqstn·ai	waipäki	äqalänäqs

(b) Xemtsk came down from above with ułuxuxut in the beginning of time; he had the prerogative of dancing at weddings. 533*
(c) Łulaiyu likewise came down with ułuxuxut, bringing the same prerogative as Xemtsk. 585
(d) The rest of this song has been forgotten. [773] [424]

Fragmentary and short as are these songs, they are more elaborate than many used at weddings. These frequently contain no words, merely an ancient tune accompanied by humming and meaningless choral interjections.[4]

Songs of this type are sung by the singers while the principal performer dances; in this respect, they resemble sisaok compositions and differ entirely from the abbreviated and individualistic wedding songs. Though used primarily to shame a runaway husband or wife, one is sometimes employed on other occasions. 586 578 [585]

Song Used for Nełuma(a), a Kimsquit Woman(b)

[WOODLESS CHORUS]

C The third part of this song has been forgotten.

(a) This word means "The one (feminine) with the very hairy pudenda." The woman in question had run away from her husband and the nickname was conferred at this shaming łłaiyałam rite. [551] [553]

[4]Two examples of such wordless songs were collected. They are song VII D 3a, National Museum of Canada; singer, Jim Pollard, and song VII D 3a, National Museum of Canada; singer, Lame Charlie.

*533 (aa) Referring to a spot outside Smith Inlet.

[776] (bb) That is: Tłaliakt'kak' had just stilled the rough sea. She was another of Qwinao's first ancestors, the most powerful of a group of four consisting of her brothers, Nain'akwa, Tłaowika'lis, and Tłaliatłis, and of herself.

(cc) Qemoqua's house, a reference to an incident in Qwina's ancestral myth.

(dd) The house contained whistles and other valuables which they obtained.

[551] (ee) That is: All people, everywhere, know of Nain'akwa and Tłaowika'lis. Each name, though singular, has a plural significance since the other brothers are likewise implied.

(ff) Referring again to the band of first settlers.

(gg) A place on the mainland opposite the north end of Vancouver Island.

Song Used for Sinupał(a)

Sialkiyuhldilundax That is why | dīno'asqtu-tmhldstil all people, everywhere, know | aiyasmān-ukstil of our ancestors(m).

(a) Recorded as song VII D 37, National Museum of Canada; singer, Jim Pollard. Both words and tune were composed by him about 1907.

(b) Referring to Wātku and his band, (I, p. 390). Sinupał was descended from this group of first people.

[192] (c) The significance of this word is stronger than inform. It means that Wātku will relate to the deceased their ancestral myth.

(d) The chief for whom this song was composed had lost several relatives.

(e) Referring to Goose Island, Ya'dalsis, where Wātku landed.

(f) Referring again to the deceased.

[192] [775] (g) The significance of this word is stronger than see. It means that those recently dead will gaze with rapture on the places which belong to them owing to their ancestral myth.

(a) This man received his name and his ability to cure the sick from Ťlitcäplilän·a about 1850. He was very ill, apparently on the point of death, at the time of his visitation.

(b) Recorded as song VII D 45a, National Museum of Canada; singer, Jim Pollard.

(c) The first part is worded as if supernatural beings were speaking.

(d) The reference is to the healing ability granted to shamans who have themselves been cured when seriously ill.

[753] (e) That is: Human beings. It is believed that a person can be cured only if Ťlitcäplilän·a or some other supernatural being implant within the patient's body some of the healing power.

[776] (f) The two choruses of this song have different tunes, an unusual feature.

(g) Referring to supernatural beings; this part of the song is worded as if Ninitsamlaix were speaking, and describing the time he was made a shaman.

(h) Reference to the wash-basin shows that Ninitsamlaix had the ability to cure the sick.

(i) The theme is worded as if supernatural beings had tended and brooded over the power which they ultimately sent down.

(j) The reference is to Nusmät·a which, as the home of supernatural beings, is consequently the place from which comes a shaman's power. When Ninitsamlaix was at the point of death, it seemed to him that the sky opened above him so that he was able to gaze upon those resident there. He watched the supernatural ones conferring about his own fate, and gazed with joy at the departure of Ťlitcäplilän·a to rescue him.

(a) This was the woman's kusiut designation; her shaman's name has been forgotten. [551]

(b) Recorded as song VII D 56, National Museum of Canada; quartet, Reuben Schooner, leader, Jim Pollard, prompter and announcer, assisted by Tāl·ia Charlie and Steamboat Annie.

(c) That is: The sky moved up and down. Grandiloquent phrases of this kind are frequent in songs used by shamans. [195]

(d) Refers to the supernatural beings.

(e) Ḡamxāmila is said to be the word for salmon in the language of the supernatural beings; it is used by mortals in the rites following the taking of the first spring salmon. The shaman has received some of her power from a fish. [198] [226]

(f) Refers to the supernatural beings.

(g) Reference to the wash-basin shows that the shaman had power to heal the sick.

(h) The meaning is obscure. Apparently the shaman had been carried away by Ṫlitcāplilān·a and treated by immersion in a basin in which eagle down was deposited.

(i) This refers to the supernatural being, Ăuunitsakıum, who restores to life mortals killed by the receipt of too much power from Ṫlitcāplilān·a. It is clear that this fate befell the shaman. [776]

(j) The woman is said to have received power from several sources, salmon, ghosts, and Ṫlitcāplilān·a herself. It is impossible to state which of her supernatural patrons is referred to in this subdivision.

(k) The woman must have been taken to one of the spots where cures could be effected by the power of a supernatural being petrified there. [755]

(b) Recorded as song VII D 20a, National Museum of Canada; singer, Jim Pollard.

(c) As is often the case, the theme is worded as if Ṭlitcāplilāw-a were speaking.

(d) It was impossible to obtain a literal translation of each of these subdivisions.

(e) Referring to Nexnāx-mālasaix; such self-praise is a common device in songs used by shamans.

(f) It was impossible to obtain a literal translation of each of these subdivisions. Reference to the mouth is in connection with the way a shaman accompanies his song by furious clashing together of his teeth. Ṭlitcāplilāw-a herself does this.

(g) It was impossible to obtain a literal translation of each of these subdivisions. Reference to the wash-basin shows that the shaman had power to heal the sick.

(b) This refers to supernatural beings in general. The song is worded as if the shaman herself were speaking.

(c) When a record was being made of this song, the singer forgot this subdivision and substituted for it the final one of the first part.

(d) It is said that there was no mention of a wash-basin in the third part and that, accordingly, the shaman had no power to heal the sick.

(a) This is a Rivers Inlet name, inherited by the present owner as a result of the marriage of one of her ancestors with a Rivers Inlet woman.
(b) According to a strict definition, Snayaxilkuse-a is not a Sun dancer. Her patron is Alpaxtam, but she does not refer to him as Snaxlatla, Sun, but as Smaiskile.
(c) This song was composed for, and used during the hactar season of 1923-4.
(d) Referring to the supernatural beings.
(e) It was impossible to obtain individual translations for these four subdivisions.
(f) Referring to those of the supernatural beings.
(g) Referring to Smaiskile.
(h) It was impossible to obtain individual translations of these two subdivisions.
(i) The reference is obscure. Allusions to wash-basins are usually found only in songs used by shamans; it is said that the dancer had a prerogative of that nature in Rivers Inlet, and insisted on it being mentioned in her hactar song. This is contrary to Bella Coola custom.
(j) The dancer's patron.
(k) It was impossible to obtain individual translations for these four subdivisions. Alăpxlachin is a supernatural being with the ability to revive mortals; little is known of him and he may be a Rivers Inlet being.

(a) Recorded as songs VII D 5 and VII D 6a, National Museum of Canada; singer, Jim Pollard. VII D 5 is a two-minute record, and as the song was too long, the last part of it was concluded on VII D 6. This resembles an ordinary mourning song, and is said to have been used formerly as one at Kimsquit. During the season of 1923-4, however, it was used at a hosiut dance given by Łałał'nimut, son of the deceased Yákotłes.

(b) Referring to the dead Yákotłes.

(c) It was impossible to obtain individual translations for these six subdivisions, and even the free interpretation may be inaccurate.

(d) That is: Yákotłes wants the best. The meaning is that the dead man is seeking out the finest elements in his ancestral myths.

[773] (e) Referring to a house at Nuxałał used by his first forefathers; it had the power of expanding so as to provide room for all who came to potlatches.

(f) The name of the house.

[551] (g) A Bella Bella name owned by Yákotłes.

(h) That is: The copper of Yákotłes is bright and gleaming like a fire. The reference is to a copper mentioned in the deceased's ancestral myth; the article furbished itself in delight at the sight of one of its first owner's ancestors. Such boasting remarks are frequent in mourning songs.

(i) In the sense of: Around the places where his first forefathers ranged.

(j) That is: His grandfather, Nukiadji, carried him around the scenes of the experiences of his first forefathers. Nukiadji was a Kwakiutl chief.

(a) Recorded as song VII D 19a, National Museum of Canada; singer, Jim Pollard. This song was composed for, and used during the kwiat season of 1923-4; the exact relationship of Sigmaw-a to Yakuhs could not be learnt. 533*

(b) Sigmaw-a was being initiated into the kwiat society and this part of the song describes, for the benefit of those who were not members, her experiences when she discovered her repository. The theme states that she felt peculiar when she reached its neighbourhood.

(c) An expression inserted to impress the uninitiated.

(d) Individual translations for these three subdivisions could not be obtained.

(e) When this song was being recorded on the phonograph, the performer erred and substituted for this subdivision the following:

ałtmuxsiwuxuł where I went.

(f) One of the names of Yakuhs. The theme here changes to the usual mourning type, describing the experiences of the deceased. [551]

(g) Referring to Mount Swaq near Kimsquit.

(h) This mountain is said to have been an active volcano within the last century and a half. The first ancestors of Yakuhs landed upon its slopes, hence the mountain became wrapped up with their fortunes and showed its delight at welcoming one of their descendants.

(i) That is: Qałmu rejoiced. She was one of his first ancestresses.

(j) That is: Qałmu welcomed Yakuhs.

(k) A house which figures in the origin myth of Yakuhs. It had the ability of expanding to accommodate as many guests as assembled. [773]

*539 a large cave in the vicinity where the hunters smoked the meat and boiled
[224] down the grease and marrow, but they had killed so many that it was January before their task was completed. Meanwhile the smell of flesh had attracted a number of martens which were caught in snares; in fact, they captured enough for two blanket-robes. When ready to leave for home, they prepared snow-shoes and on these safely negotiated the deep drifts and reached the village where all hope of their safety had long been abandoned. Ätsaxomtsam arrived at dusk and heard his parents weeping and wailing; he asked who had died and found that they were mourning for him. His safe return turned their lamentations into rejoicings and a herald was sent out to call in the villagers to share the good news. When finally packed in, there was enough goat meat for an elaborate potlatch.*

[226] A year or two later, four men prepared to set out one afternoon to fish for trout. As they were leaving, Ätsaxomtsam's young son begged to be taken along and cried so piteously that they at last consented. So they wrapped him carefully in a goat-skin blanket, and placed him in the bottom of the canoe which they paddled about six miles upstream. They landed on the bank, cooked a meal, and dried black spruce branches over [226] the fire to serve as torches to lure the fish within range of their spears. When night had fallen, they began to drift downstream, one man holding aloft a brand while the others speared. They had fair success, but nothing noteworthy occurred until, as they neared Nuqalit, they saw white on the water, and paddled slowly forward, thinking it must be a huge flock of swans. As they drew nearer they saw that it was snow; a huge slide had swept over the village and blocked the channel of the river. The water, no longer able to flow westward, was swirling back to the east, and the fishermen drifted with it until they found a place to camp for the night with their young companion.

As soon as it was light, they returned to the scene of the disaster and found a deep bed of snow over the site of the village. They landed to investigate, and called repeatedly, hoping that some at least had escaped. At last they heard an answer and began to dig, imagining that it must be Ätsaxomtsam himself. After excavating a deep hole, they unburied the sole survivor, a slave who had escaped by covering with a copper the

* We will be noticed that there are many points of similarity between this story and the one in vol. II, p. 111. It is possible that they are versions of the same incident, but it seems more likely that they refer to different incidents of which the principal character of one has been forgotten. In such cases the Bella Coola, believing [538] that individuals with the same name often have the same characteristics, frequently [551] give to the hero of an earlier incident the name of a person who has figured in a similar one within recent years.

614 583 [551] The evidence which I can present regarding the laws of intermarriage is the following: I inquired of Nuxk'ala'ata (would water in bow), a member of the Ialx'ulmult gens, whether he might marry a Spatel'ût woman; this suggestion he rejected with the greatest indignation.

Members of the first two gentes, he explained later on, are not allowed to intermarry, neither are members of the last two gentes, while the first and second may marry among the third and fourth. He accounted for this by stating that Ialx'ulmult's are essential Spatel'ût's daughters, and that consequently the two gentes were related to each other.

[392] [532]

ceremonial. Every time the sacred objects of a gens are shown to the 614 people a potlatch is given. The sacred objects, although the property of the 532 various gentes, must nevertheless be acquired by each individual. That is to say, every free person has the right to acquire a certain group of 422 carvings and masks, according to the gens to which he or she belongs. 556 Slaves and slaves' children, also illegitimate children, could not become Sisaa'ks. A person cannot take a new carving, but must wait until it is [567] given to him by his relatives—father, mother, or elder brother. Nesh'e- [848] la'ula, to whom I owe my information regarding the gentes, and who is a member of the gens Tale'ainist of the Talle'ait, stated that he had received the raven when he gave his first potlatch. At his second potlatch [115] he received the eagle. He hopes that his mother will give him the whale at his next potlatch, and will at the same time divulge to him the secrets connected with it. In course of time, he said, he might get even others from his brother; but if the latter's children should prove to be very good, and develop very rapidly, his brother would probably give his secrets to his children. At festivals, when a person acquires a new secret, he 64 changes his name. Each person has two names, a Ki'ititt name, which 424 remains the same throughout life; and a Qi'ntelen name, which is changed 551 at these festivals. Thus, Nesh'ele'ula's (which is his Ki'ititt name) present Qi'ntelen name is Ai'ilmaw'lna'ait, but at his next potlatch he 556 intends to take the name of Kalit'la. These names are also the property of the various gentes, each gens having its own names. In the list of 575 gentes given above, the names enumerated are the Ki'ititt names of the gentes. In two cases only the Qi'ntelen names have been ascertained (see p. 426). When a man possesses several Sisaa'ks secrets he will dis- 424 tribute them among his children. When a girl marries, her father or 575 mother may, after a child has been born to her, give one or several of their Sisaa'ks secrets to her husband, so his children make him a member 614 of the gens. When a person gets to be old he gives away all his Sisaa'ks secrets. After my secret has been given away the giver must not use it [426] any more. The crest and the Sisaa'ks carvings must not be loaned to others, but each person must keep his own carvings. The only exceptions are the sacred headdresses and the raven rattles, which are not the property of any particular gens.

The laws regarding the potlatch are similar to those of the Kwakiutl. 556
The creditor of a person becomes the debtor of the person who gave 426 the potlatch. If the latter should die the debts become due to his heirs. If the debtor should die his heirs become responsible for the debt. Property is also destroyed at potlatches. This is not returned, and serves only to enhance the social position of the individual who performed this act. It is not necessary that all the property given by a person in a potlatch should be owned by him. He may borrow part of it from his friends, and has to repay it with interest. I was told, for instance, that a man borrowed a large copper-plate and burnt it at a potlatch. When doing so he had to name the price which he was going to pay to the owner in the stead. Since that feast he died, and his heirs are now responsible for the amount named at the potlatch.

The Ki'ititt is presided over by a female spirit, called Aneiklitini'a. 575
She dwells in a cave in the woods, which she keeps shut from February 773 till October, remaining all the while inside. In October she opens the door of her cave and sits in front of it. A woman is said to have been 776 the first to find her. Aneiklitini'a invited her into her cave and taught

6:Boas E-5 (1886-ca. 1890)1892

575 her the secrets of the Ka'siût. She wore ornaments of red cedar-bark
773 around her head, wrists, and ankles; her face was blackened, her hair
776 strewn with eagle-down. She commanded the women to dance in the same way as she saw her dancing. The people should accompany her dance with songs, and, after she had finished, they should dance with masks. She said, 'Whenever a person sees me your people shall dance the Ka'siût. If you do not do so I shall punish you with death and sickness. In summer, while I am in my house, you must not dance the Ka'siût.'

575 Ever since that time the Bilqula dance the Ka'siût. When a man has 776 seen Anaûlikûtsai'n sitting before her cave he will invite the people to a Ka'siût. A ring made of red and white cedar-bark is hung up in his house, and the uninitiated are not allowed to enter it. Only in the evening, when dances are performed, they may look on, standing close to the door. As soon as the dances are over they must retire from the taboo house. Each Ka'siût lasts three days.

535 The various dances performed by members of the Ka'siût are also the 575 property of the gentes, and the right of performing them is restricted
614 to members of the gens. They must not be given to a daughter's husband, as is the case with the Sisaa'kn dances (see above), but belong to the 424 members of the gens alone. They may, however, be leased and borrowed by members of the gens, who have a right to a particular dance, but who [426] do not own it. Permission to use a mask or dance is obtained from the owner by payments. The owner may reclaim the dance or the borrower 575 may return it at any time. Membership of the Ka'siût is obtained through an initiation. At this time the novice is given his Ka'siût name, which [551] he retains throughout life. Each gens has its peculiar Ka'siût names,
[428] which are inherited by young persons from their parents or from other relatives. Thus a young man who had the name of Pû'pû until he was about seventeen years old obtained at his initiation the name of T'kûs'ûl. I have not reached a very clear understanding of the details of the initia-
[552] tion; it seems that the dance is simply given to the novice in the same way as the Sisaa'kn, this initiation being connected with a potlatch. But [787] still it seems possible that he must 'dream' of the dance which he is to perform. Only the highest degrees of the Ka'siût have to pass through a religious ceremony of some importance. The highest degrees are the [554] tlaqô'tla (the Ha'mats'a of the Kwakiutl), the Ô'lq (the Ts'ûmsît of the Kwakiutl), and the Dâ'tla (the Ts'ûnsîsît of the Ts'ûnsît). These grades are also hereditary. A Ka'siût novice may acquire them at once at his first initiation.

575 When the tlaqô'tla is initiated he goes into the forest, where he 785 encounters his guardian spirit. It is believed that he goes up to the sun, and formerly he had to take human flesh along for food. The chiefs held
[266] killed, in order to serve as food for the tlaqô'tla. The offer was accepted and a payment of from ten to twenty blankets made for the slave. The latter was killed, and the members of the tlaqô'tla order devoured one-half of the body before the departure of the novice to the woods. There the latter is tied up and left to fast. He may stay there for twenty or thirty days until the spirit appears to him and takes him up to the sun, 575 where he is initiated. Early one morning he returns, and is heard outside the houses. He has lost all his hair, which, it is believed, has been torn

751 whence wind, light, and life, to the natives of the valleys of their hills have stopped down." During their monthly [illegible] periods women place with cedar bark in the vagina. The bark is afterwards burnt in the woods. The source of this fire is believed to be primeval.

It is evident that the culture of the Bilqula is very greatly influenced 177 by that of the K'wakiutl. The social organization and the political organization 551 are almost a copy of those of the Dzitsaqa. This influence has been so 556 deep that names of even fables and of the mythical ancestors of certain 575 gentes are purely K'wakiutl words, or have at least K'wakiutl endings. Thus 575 the name K'wadi'lkya (see p. 410) is purely K'wakiutl, meaning "good all 716 over the world." K'wak'wadi'lkya is also a K'wakiutl word, meaning 721 "the rich one of the world." The chief's name, Ma'kayala (see p. 410) belongs to the same class of K'wakiutl names. On the other hand, the religious ideas of the Bilqula are very centrally developed, and apparently but slightly influenced by their neighbors. The whole Shamanistic tradition is peculiar to them, but has been partly adopted by the Ts'ets'aut, Tsaq, with whom the Bilqula have intermarried.

At festivals, when a person acquires new secret, he changes his name. Each person has two names, a [illegible] name, which remains through life, and a [illegible] name, which is changed at these festivals. Thus, Fort Simpson (which is his [illegible] name) [illegible] name was [illegible], but at his next potlatch he intended to take the name of [illegible]. These names are the property of the various clans, and also having to own names. When a man possesses several clan's secrets, he will distribute them among his children. When a girl marries, her father or mother may, after a child has been born to her, give one or several of their clan's secrets to her husband, as his children make him a member of her clan. The crest and the clan's carvings must not be loaned to others, but each person must keep his own carvings. The only exceptions are the carved headbands and the carve rattles, which are not the property of any particular clan.

The laws regarding the potlatch are similar to those of the [illegible]. The nephew of a person becomes the father of the person who gave the potlatch. If the latter should die, the debts become due to his heirs. If the father should die, his heirs become responsible for the debt. Property is also destroyed at potlatches. Alpuxtáw is ceremonially, but inaccurately, called Sun, the Sun.

Though Alpuxtáw often sojourns in the sun, his home is in the flat land above the sky, a huge house which figures prominently both in Bella Coola mythology and present-day thought. The name of the house is Nacmáx-a. It resembles those constructed on this earth, but is boundless in size. Like the houses of human beings, its name is changed according to what is taking place within. Every autumn the supernatural beings gather there to await the coming of Alpuxtáw at the winter solstice; while waiting they pass the time by performing the equivalent of the earthly Sacrat dances (II, chap. 4). This assembly is termed palowaic, and the house, during this period, Nacpalowaicta.

The following names of the house, with meanings, were obtained:

Nacmáx-a, "The Place of Myths."

Nacpámlaxtáw, "Where Everything Was Begun."

Nacmáxlátowaxtáw, "The Place Whence Came the Falling Down."

Nacmáxwaxtáw, "The Place Where Mankind was Made."

Nacálpuxtáwtáw, "The Place Where Alpuxtáw Speaks."

Nacpalowaicta, "The Place of the Palowaic."

Nacmáxtáw, "The Place of Meeting," or "The Council House."

Nalowaxtáx. The meaning of this word is unknown.

Anacmáxtáwáx, "The Moving House." The significance of this last name rests on an ancient myth in which the house is conceived as moving from place to place.

To grasp the significance of these designations it is necessary to understand the beliefs of the Bella Coola concerning the creation. The mythology contains no account of the origin or birth of Alpuxtáw himself, nor of the making of this world. In the beginning of time no living creature, either animal or vegetable, existed with the exception of Alpuxtáw. He, therefore, decided to alter and populate the world and

and eagles whom he invites to devour it. In so doing, he does not address them by their usual names, but calls Wolf, Ałwa-i-gunum, "The Devourer of Meat Which He Does Not Kill," that is, "The Biting Scavenger"; and Eagle, Aoaikaiyuamunum, "The Constant Eater," that is, "The One Who Eats before He Is Hungry." Next morning the flesh has been devoured and the hunter believes his guests have eaten it. Animals and birds, being supernatural, can hear the words of mortals and read their thoughts. The significance of these actions is that animals have the power to conceal themselves, so a hunter must gain their favour before he can hope to succeed. Belief in the efficacy of such customs as these is rapidly falling into decay and bear meat is now often eaten, but the skull is carefully placed in an evergreen tree near where the animal is slain, so that it may come back to life.

Fish, likewise, are immortal. In autumn the streams are choked with dead and dying salmon, but the Bella Coola know that they are not really dead, they have merely shed their worthless blankets in accordance with Alpuxtiw's decrees. At that season of the year he causes the rivers to rise so that they will sweep away these useless and outworn cloaks.

Although the salmon, from the kindness of their hearts, allow human beings to feast on their blankets, yet they have certain likes and dislikes which are carefully observed. From the time the first spring salmon appear (I, pp. 759-762) until the rising of the July moon, women are not allowed to eat them or to go near the river. Men may eat the flesh, but instead of throwing the bones to dogs, they carefully return them to the river saying:

"Please come back tomorrow."

If this is inconvenient, bones can be thrown into the woods with impunity.

Salmon, like men and animals, live a human-like existence in their homes far beneath the surface of the ocean. They lack and desire earthly objects, especially pounded cedar-bark (see Appendix A) to use as sponges for their children, so the Bella Coola throw pieces of it and eagle down on the water.

Raven, perhaps made conceited by this power, did not always use it for good purposes. He learnt many new inventions which he taught to the Bella Coola, but sometimes he indulged in adventures of an obscene nature. In fact, he was often too "smart." The Bella Coola relate many tales concerning his exploits. These are all mere stories, such as can be told by anyone, and they fall into two classes. One comprises humorous anecdotes, describing how Raven tried to show off, to outwit other birds and animals, and his consequent discomfiture. These belong to the realm of mythology and are recorded in vol. II, chap. v. In addition, there are stories describing the inventions and boons obtained by Raven; these are given in detail here as the only satisfactory means of illustrating the attitude of the Bella Coola towards Raven.

The first Raven, to whom Alquntám granted such power, is not regarded as a bird, but essentially as a superman, with the kindly characteristics of a human being, and the weakness of a conceited individual who is always trying to display his prowess. The ordinary word used for a raven is qmas, but this first Raven is properly referred to by his titles as chief, Nemaklis; Ináwaimdmots, "The Light-Bringer"; Kilakumsmi, "The Wise One"; Ná'cwmhumnsis, "The Widower";* Kumqumsa ulkilit cqwa, "The Unknown of Light";* Qas ásmcila, Qmai ilit, and Qmi. The Bella Coola do not explain what happened to this first Nemaklis; he appears to have dropped out of existence, and his power has not been transmitted to his descendants, the ravens of today. They are regarded as birds, with but the slightest trace of their ancestor's greatness. The Bella Coola know of the beliefs of the Kitkatla concerning Raven, and say that in the north he is esteemed only a little less than the supreme deity himself. But in Bella Coola the exploits of Raven are always considered to be due to the power given him by Alquntám, whose servant he was, although he delighted to show his own prowess by outwitting his maker.

* Whatever he is supposed to have widowed (from his second of the first section, referring to the manner in which Raven is supposed to have corrupted the sun.

614 extinct, are unusual; normally, the group is largely centred in 621 one village, but with members scattered in other localities. There is no central organization. It is generally recognized that such a unit belongs in the village where its first ancestors settled, and the leading chief of that village is, therefore, an important person in the family, though without status of [622] "head" of it. His advice may be appealed to in cases of dis- [553] putes concerning names, but he lacks judicial authority. Theoretically, the descendants of the elder of two first people are considered as "elder brothers and elder sisters" of those descended from a younger brother or sister; but this is nothing more than an accepted fact; it plays no part in the social life of the community.

552 In addition to human names, the origin myths include those 614 applied to dogs. The first ancestral group had dogs, and these 793 animals had names, or were given them by their powerful masters. Ever since that time their descendants can apply these designations to their own dogs. It is unnecessary to validate such names, but no two canines can be given the same one at the same time, according to the rule which governs the bestowal of human names. This matter was not investigated in detail, and the only dog's name collected was one for which [539] the origin myth is as follows:

When Tal'ia was first settled in the beginning of time, the houses were built in parallel rows, one above the other, up the side of a steep knoll. At the very top was a cedar house, built over such a steep incline [54] that movement rolled down the hillside. In consequence, one of the early chiefs living there gave to his dog the name, Ha'ipmamal ki mual, "Rolling movement," which has since been preserved in the ancestral family of his descendants.

LAND

124 Great difficulty was experienced in obtaining information 428 about land tenure. The Bella Coola cannot keenly the way in

554 it to the digestive tract. After a man has given four potlatches he feels superior to those who have been unable to do likewise.
556 His name is "bright," "clean," "heavy," "firm," or "upright"
622 in Bella Coola terms, and so, likewise, his seat. He feels inde-[578] pendent and proud. Such a chief will fearlessly enter the backroom where ceremonial rites are taking place, even if not entitled to do so.

"He is so strong, he can go where he will," say the Bella Coola.

The advice of such a man is taken because of his ability and prestige, especially by the members of his own family. A few years ago, for example, when a certain Bella Coola died, his brother wished a kwiat name-prerogative of the deceased to pass to the dead man's daughter. The girl's mother's father, a nemit chief, objected, and his desires were followed, although the name in question was not connected in any way with his family. In small matters, too, people gladly carry out the

"You bet," the old man answered emphatically with a dry chuckle.

231 It is difficult now to form an accurate estimate, from observation, of the influence of chiefs solely through virtue of the
• 552 goods they have expended. But the following is a concrete 622 example. In November, 1923, the writer, while walking through the Bella Coola village, was bitten by a dog. He was told that the animal belonged to a certain old woman. When next he saw the owner he asked her whether she knew that her dog attacked passers-by.

"Yes," she answered, in a matter-of-fact tone, "He is a chief and can do what he likes."

Further questioning elicited the information that the old [766] woman and her husband, the childless last survivors of an ancestral family, had transferred some of their ancestral names to their dog, and had distributed presents to validate 231 the bestowal. Consequently, the animal is a chief (see Plate 552 11) and can do as he likes. When it dies it will be mourned 622 as a chief. Moreover, a number of people have returned the 766 presents which they received at the time the dog wasmade a chief, and this money is kept by the woman and her husband, to be used when they perform the rite of mourning fothe dog at death.

When this is possible, in the present degenerate dys, it is 556 * not difficult to understand how, formerly, a great chief felt 622 himself above the restraints that hindered lesser men. The [156] last great Bella Coola chief was Pashe, who died between 1870 and 1880. His influence and power were so great the he was a virtual ruler, during anything. If he requested a yong man to take his food hom home and the youth was slow o obey, Pashe had no hesitation in killing him on the spot. Sch great power, though unusual, is intelligible to the Bella Coola, since Pashe gave far more potlatches than any of his contemporaries. Other chiefs have been known to attempt a similar rbitrary use of power, but have failed, since their prestige was ot great enough to justify it. The force of a mighty chief spreads up [628] and down the coast, and protects him and the members of his family from being ambushed and slain in any sporadic fray. During an actual fight, however, a chief has to take [726] his chances with the rest, but the comparative immunity was a great advantage.

The Bella Coola recognize the fundamental differences 171 between their own concepts about chieftainship andthose of 556 * other coastal tribes with whom they come in contact. This 622 point was mentioned in the course of conversation by several 829 men. The most powerful chief known to them was Tsalua, who, they say, was virtual monarch of the Kitkatla. None of his subjects could go hunting without his permission, and he had rights to a certain share of their booty. At any ceremony presents had first to be given to him, and if he were slighted in this respect, he would kill the offender. It is be-

*556 chief to pay somewhat lavishly, since the value of the copper [435] depends on the amount expended on it.
[497] The $20 received by the poor man must not be casually spent. He is expected to invite the whole village to his house, *556 otherwise he would never again be given a copper. The heralds 735 call everyone to the house, the singers as usual being the first to arrive. They beat out the kuziut song of anyone, to which [533] the owner dances; the songs are used one after another, until [575] almost every member of the society has danced. Sasaá songs may then be used in the same way. Since the supernatural beings are not present, the rite has no religious significance; it is merely a social affair. At the close of the dancing, the poor man distributes food to all, equivalent in value to the money received. It is probable that poor men sometimes give away slightly less than they have received, although any noticeable laxity in this would be punished by the receipt of no further coppers. The recipient of a copper from a fire derives no direct gain from it, though it is to his indirect advantage, since a person who has given away food is likely to receive larger presents on future occasions than one who has not.

Meanwhile the chief owning the copper is unable to use it 495 at his potlatch since the value, dependent on the goods ex-*556 pended for it, is only $10, a sum so small that to use it would be insulting to his dead ancestor. There are several ways of increasing its value:

(1) By Painting. Taking advantage of some ceremony [532] when a number of people are present, the owner gives a carpenter $10, for example, with a request that he paint on his copper a representation of the crest used by his, the owner's, first ancestor, when coming to this earth. Henceforth the value of the copper is $20.

495 (2) By Naming. The Bella Coola say that among the ●552 Kwakiutl names are given to almost all coppers; in Bella
*556 Coola it is a rare practice. Occasionally, a chief creates a name for his copper and validates this by presents to all the

NE4 Bellacoola NE6

village at some ceremony, exactly as a child's name is conferred. Designations are chosen with respect to the appearance of the copper, or some incident connected with its history. Such a designation is Gwaiowas, "Begrimed," applied to a copper thrown many times into the fire. If, for instance, $50 be expended for a name, the value of a $30 copper is henceforth $80. 435 552 556*

(3) By Making Gifts. The owner of a copper can increase its value by calling together the other chiefs of his village, and sometimes of adjacent ones as well. After the customary meal, the owner expounds the history of his possession, giving details of its value. Then he passes it to one of his guests, who, unless he wishes to insult his host, must hold it upright, that is, with the broad end uppermost. The owner gives it in turn to each of his guests. To validate the display, the owner must bestow gifts on all present, and the total value of these is added to the value of the copper. Such gifts are not strictly returnable, although it is customary for chiefs to show their generosity and prowess to their fellows by a later repayment with interest. 435 556* [578] [426]

By these means the original purchaser of a worthless copper can increase its value to such a point that it can be used at a potlatch. There is no established custom about this. Coppers are not as valuable in Bella Coola as, for instance, at Fort Rupert, and it is unlikely that any are ever worth more than $300, and the average value is probably between $150 and $200. Considerable time is required to raise the value of a copper to this sum and the owner in many cases finds that he has all the other requirements before his copper is ready for use. In that case, he tries to buy another which has been raised to sufficient worth by its owner. Everyone knows the values of the different coppers in the community, and the intending purchaser calls his fellow-chiefs to his house and offers to buy one valued, for example, at $150. If the owner consents to sell, he usually endeavours to get as much as possible, perhaps $175. The sum is publicly paid and is henceforth the value of the copper, which is transmitted to the new [771] 435 437 556*

534 In course of time, as they grew wealthy, they were able to summon people from far and near for potlatches. This in turn enabled them to validate several names which they had brought from above. Ilpentsw had given Nuxmalkmut a box containing whistles for Sacint rites. He used them and bestowed on one of his sisters the name Nuxwemut, a Sacint designation still in existence. When the roof of the house was opened light came through, from which circumstance the name Syeut was acquired at one of their annual potlatches. Not only was Nuxmalkmut able to validate designations which Ilpentsw had given him, but he created several new ones as well. He gave to his sisters the names Kilpentsum and Sphenjuste-a; the latter means "Rising Dust," with reference to the dust rising from the floor of the house as Nuxmalkmut threw down the remnants which he was about to give away to his guests.

[551] All the names mentioned in this myth have been preserved. That of Nuxmalkmut is held in especial esteem by the people of Swan. It means "Head of the River," referring to the point where he came to this [552] earth. Even Nuxmalkmut is still in use, applied to a dog as the owner has no children.

THIRD ORIGIN MYTH OF Swan[*]

In the beginning Ilpentsw went down to Sneiter-a, at the head of the Clearwater, a branch of the Bella Coola River, four brothers, Alkut, Dudzeeny[*], Nimtchut, and one whose name has been forgotten, with their sisters, Kinthlu and Cwinthu. Dudzeeny[*] had brought with him from above as a present from Ilpentsw some clubs to announced down and one of the large ones shaped whistles used in sacint ceremonials. The two women cried because they had no house. But presently they thought they were in one with a wonderfully painted roof; in reality it was the sky and the decorations were brightly shining stars. By means of their supernatural power, for they were not yet mortals, they reduced the firmament to such small compass that it was really a house to them, with the one-dimensional sky as roof. Taking this shader with them, the six set out next day for Pawat, a point on the mainland opposite the north end of Vancouver Island. They travelled down the valley of a river which runs not far from the Sneiter-a source of the Bella Coola. Alkut and his relatives did not like the language of the people living at Pawat, so they returned to Sneiter-a, taking with them some of the few $539 In course of time Swaqhkhlo became so wealthy that he was able to call people from far and near for a potlatch. He built a house identical in every particular with that of Sqwayna as he had seen it. He bestowed on his children not only the names which Sqwayna gave to him, but also [557] two which he took from what he had seen, Lots, the whale which was outside the front of the house, and Lhlakho, the significance of which could not be determined.

[558] These two designations have since been transmitted in this family, and now have bestowed on a dog, there being no children left.

ORIGIN MYTH OF Tsi'ts[a]

In the beginning of time, Sqwayna sent down to this world a man, Ai'mulnaix, with his two sisters, Ailsumka, "The Shadow-Shell Woman," and Ailsinlo-tsilhin, "The One with Shadows on Her Hair." The three landed on an island several miles in circumference, formed of an enormous shadow-shell; its location is now unknown, but it was somewhere in the south, presumably not far from Vancouver. There they dwelt for some time and began to construct a house for themselves out of the shell. All the time they longed to travel in search of a desirable place to settle, but they lacked means of transportation. At this juncture Raven appeared, and offered them a canoe if they would promise to use it. They readily agreed and presently the supernatural bird returned with one. It was a sqwatch, one of the mythical monsters who live beneath the ocean and such dives small craft by opening their mouths.

Ai'mulnaix and his sisters embarked. They had discovered their hats and blankets with shadow-shell and took with them a large store of the same material. Raven perched on the bow and croaked whenever they drew near a landing-place. After travelling a considerable distance, they saw smoke rising, and presently noticed a house. Ai'mulnaix landed to investigate and found it occupied by a solitary woman, Tlelmulkiqualem, the place where she lived was called Nqamulim, probably on Johnson Point. Ai'mulnaix asked her to accompany the party as his sister (meaning her a non-marriageable female relative, not an own sister). She agreed after much discussion. The four continued their travels until they drew near Fort Rupert, where they saw more smoke. As before, Ai'mulnaix landed and found another solitary woman, Ktsul'kiu'yulem, whom he also persuaded to join the group as his sister. The five now passed on to Rivers Inlet, where Raven vanished. The others thought he had left them here, unknown to them all, he had secured Tlelmulkiqualem's body. They paddled on for so the lake on the head of Rivers Inlet where they abandoned he rowed the whole distance on a single billow, or wave, to be seen on a four-billow wave. His canoe was a sea-lion's stomach, into which he climbed through the mouth and which he made watertight by tying up the entrance with the animal's entrails. Whether or not the creature was alive is not clear, but at any rate the man set off in the strange craft. He felt as if he were on the back of an animal which made long, slow, slow bounds. It was the slow surging of a gigantic Pacific comber. After four bounds he arrived the rock and found himself at home.

Certain names have been preserved from this myth. The name Nuqua is now used by a dog as the owner to the face of his family. Another name is Tlamamqmid, "The Creek," derived from the metallic sound of the closing door of the sea-lion house. The name Numaxes was also obtained inside the house, but the details of its significance are lost.

AN EARLIER MYTH OF Kitlah?*

As has been said, ambitious individuals, especially if they lack origin myths of the customary kind, sometimes claim ordinary stories as such. The following is almost certainly a case in point. It was obtained from an unreliable informant, who claimed it as a family myth, and said he had used it as a potlatch. He asserted that it was a Bella Bella story, transmitted through the marriage of one of his ancestors with a Bella Bella woman. Another informant, well versed in Bella Bella folk-lore, recounted another version of the same myth as a mere tale. There seems little doubt that the first informant had merely laid claim to a common story to supply the deficiency of a true myth.

In the beginning, there came down to earth at the head of Cox Bay, Kitlah, a salmon man whose name was Sisaka. He was so lonely that he made for himself from soft pasky wood a woman, dressed her in blankets and clothing, and gave her the name, Qualtaxa, which is in the Bella Bella language. Sisaka was a great hunter; every day he went out to seek numerous game, which provided him with great quantities of grease, as well as yarn that he wove into blankets. Before leaving the house he always placed Qualtaxa in front of a fire, put food beside her and told her to eat as much as she liked and to work diligently.

This endogamic principle will be described in greater detail in vol. I, chap. vii, but mention of it here has been necessary to explain the composition of the ancestral family. 582 [614]

In recent years there has been a tendency for some men to marry foreign women in order that they, or their children, might obtain new prerogatives. Thus a trend towards exogamy has arisen from the same reason which is alleged to have caused endogamy. The offspring of such marriages cannot enjoy the feeling of strength and comfort that comes from the membership of both parents in the same ancestral family, but some individuals have felt that this was offset by the gain of highly desirable foreign prerogatives. It is said that this practice was initiated by a certain Pudas, father of a man about sixty years old in 1923. White influence probably had nothing to do with this radical innovation, although its wide adoption has been made more easy by the establishment of peaceful conditions on the coast. [554] [777]

Strong as is the belief in a common ancestry, it is unlikely that this would have sufficed to hold together the members of the ancestral family, without some definite prerogatives. These are of two kinds: names and land. 614 554

NAMES

The fundamental principle governing Bella Coola nomenclature is that each name must have originated in connection with some event of comparative importance. It is unthinkable to apply a casual designation to a child. At a person's death his name, or names, may be transmitted to a relative, and it is proper that the owner of a name should know when, by whom, and for what reason, it was first created. Tradition affirms that, before coming to this earth, the first people were all given designations by Alquntsha; these have been carefully handed down and are still in use. One name cannot be given to two individuals; instances occur of two people having the same one, but in such cases they have different origins. One person may have several names of different kinds, each carrying 551 [48] [553] [773] [828]

551 with is some definite prerogative of a dance or other function, 421 but all are transmissible, and at the owner's death these may fall to different relatives. A name may pass from man to woman, or vice versa, in some cases with a minor alteration. [752] The only non-inheritable appellations are those obtained by shamans as a result of their supernatural experiences.

551 Not only did each group of first settlers bring with them a 775 number of designations from above, but they also created a [illegible] number on this earth and bestowed them on their children, and on the children of their sisters or brothers, in whom they felt an almost personal interest. To mark the dignity of the names, all present at the ceremony of bestowal received gifts from the creator of the name, the person who called them together for the rite. The importance of the individual depended largely upon the value of the goods distributed with respect to his name, a concept which will be elaborated in the following chapter. The descendants of these first people likewise created new designations and established their dignity by distributing presents, a practice which still continues. It follows that any complete origin myth should include a large number of names, those brought down from the land above[1] and also those created by the powerful first people on this earth itself.[2] Both types of cognomen will be referred to henceforth as "ancestral names," no distinction being made between those actually brought from above and those made on earth. This is in accordance with Bella Coola usage.

553 Soon after the birth of a child his father, uncle, or other [illegible] members of the village together to bestow a name on the infant. The one selected must be embodied in the origin myth of one or other of the parents, and must be one not then in use by any other member of the ancestral family. A relative may give the child one of his own names, in which case the donor surrenders all claim to it. This designation is the obvious mark of the position of the child in the ancestral family. Without such a formal conferring of an ancestral name an infant would be without status in the community, but, as children are always welcome, some relative is invariably ready to confirm the bestowal by the necessary distribution of goods, a feature that is present in every Bella Coola ceremonial. On such occasions the guests are called by their ancestral names. An effort was made to learn what would happen if the number of children born into an ancestral family exceeded the number of ancestral names embodied in its origin myth, but no answer was forthcoming. Established custom demands that a name be provided for every child, and one is always provided. Without question designations must be invented, usually from some event in the origin myth, but it is always claimed that such were used by a long-deceased ancestor. In fact, the social custom agrees with the requirements of the mythological concept. Since bestowal of names is a matter of pride, it follows that a child often receives several from the ancestral families of which he is a member; the possession of these is a source of gratification to the owner.

An ancestral name given to a child is spoken of as an ástqaut name, and the recipient as an ástqaut, which may be translated, "commoner." He may be given several names from one origin myth, or ones from diverse origin myths if his parents are members of different ancestral families. These designations may either be those brought down from above by the first people, those made on this earth by them, or those made at some important event by later persons. Irrespective of what combination of these possibilities a child may have, he is still a commoner, and his ability to rise to the position of chief depends on his own, or his parents', ability to give potlatches, as will be described in the next chapter. In such a case his ástqaut name is said to have been elevated to that of a sáhlumy (chief's) name.

614 The ancestral family may, therefore, be defined as those 553 whose distinct names are embodied in the same origin

What is the stability of this group?

In consequence of the large number of names theoretically embodied in every myth, and of the necessity for validating the bestowal of any one of these by means of presents, it follows that there is always a large number of dormant names. The Bella Coola describe these as being, "In the burial ground." They are, in fact, dead. Any one of these may be resurrected by any member of the ancestral family. If a woman marries into a foreign tribe her relatives occasionally give her husband, outright, an ancestral name. In such a case that name is permanently alienated from the family to which it formerly belonged; this should happen only when the group is reduced to a few individuals, all of whom agree to the transaction.
[583] But more often a woman takes as a wedding gift to her husband a name which it is understood cannot be transmitted to one of his relatives unless he has children. On the death of the childless husband, this designation reverts to his widow's ancestral family. If there are children, they cement the bond of friendship between the two families. The brother of a woman so married also bestows names on her children, as further mark of their incorporation into her ancestral family.
[583] It is customary and proper, however, for the ancestral family into which a woman is married and bears children to reciprocate the compliment a few generations later, and by the marriage of one of their women to restore such names to the ancestral family to which they originally belonged. According to the Bella Coola, this practice of "return-marriage" has been the rule since the first exogamic marriages of the first people, with the result that names usually return to the patrilineal descendants of the first people to use them.

611 If a woman marries outside her ancestral family, her chil-
614 dren will belong to at least two distinct ancestral groups. It is difficult to say how long an individual remembers the dif-

fewest units with which he is connected, but the following is an instance of survival for several generations. Ḡwai-lik is an orphan about ten years of age, now living in Bella Coola; he is looked upon with considerable respect as being a member of ancestral families in Bella Coola, Kimsquit, Smith Inlet, Kitkatla, and Kitkata. His pedigree, given below, explains his powers. The symbol = marks a marriage, and the male is shown on the left in each case.

Theoretically, Ḡwai-lik is as much a native of Smith Inlet as he is of Bella Coola where his father made his home. If he should visit Smith Inlet and make known his pedigree, he would be received by the members of the ancestral family of his great-great-grandmother.[1] His welcome would be more assured if he were the owner of a name from their origin myth. Difficulties of communication and frequent wars made it virtually impossible in the old days to keep in touch with relatives in distant tribes, except in the case of a mighty chief who was able to invite visitors from great distances to feasts. Thus names taken by women to foreign husbands were virtually lost to the members of her ancestral family. In the course of a few generations, such designations carried, whilst would be revived as if dormant by some member of the family, and all recollection of the foreign marriage forgotten.

[1] As the Bella Coola are now living in a single village, it was impossible to obtain a modern instance of the ownership by one individual of rights in a number of families within the tribal area. It appears certain, however, that the sentiment expressed with regard to Ḡwai-lik on Smith Inlet are identical with those formerly held for possession by ancestral families located in different Bella Coola villages.

The converse of this process of loss is the assimilation to an origin myth of names originally brought into the ancestral family by a woman from abroad. Unless intercourse and friendly relations were maintained by "return marriages," in a few generations no tradition would be remembered to account for the name, and this, if used at all, would be interwoven into the well-known ancestral myth. Hence a myth is not static with regard to the names embodied in it. Thus change from generation to generation, it is probable that elements of the story itself suffer like additions and alterations, even though the people do not consider this to be the case.

The Bella Coola regard the ancestral family as a social unit, not only in terms of the present, but as extending back to the first settlement of the earth. Viewed from this angle, it is in fact, though not admitted to be so by the Bella Coola, a unilateral grouping with patrilineal descent, which may, in both the most recent and most ancient generations, be marked by matrilineal descent instead. A man frequently uses prerogatives obtained through his mother, her mother, or even her mother's mother, but it is tacitly assumed that for many previous generations such rights passed in the patrilineal line. Sometimes this succession extended back to the beginning of time; in other cases, prerogatives were transmitted matrilineally for a considerable period after the settlement of the earth, before gradually becoming patrilineal.

It has been thus far assumed that the only prerogative wrapped up in an ancestral name is a knowledge of the myth in which it is embodied. But there are others. For example, several of the four inheritances of the world are said to have crest-totem-poles, each of which was displayed by its owner at the gathering when he took for himself a name. Therefore, the only person entitled to use that particular crest-pole design was the person with the legal right to the name in question. The same principle governs all dance names, each entitling its owner to perform a certain ceremonial. Thus it is possible to enlarge the previous definition by saying that:

The uncorrel family consists of those whose uncorrel names, embodying definite prerogatives, are embodied in a single origin myth.

A stranger finds it easier to understand why names are so carefully maintained within the uncorrel family by thinking of them as symbols of prerogatives, but it must be emphasized that the Bella Coola preserve with equal jealousy those designations of which the only prerogative is the marking of this actual membership.

If, then, the uncorrel family be regarded as a group possessing a large number of name-prerogatives, it may well be asked how these are distributed among its members. The first point to be emphasized is that the uncorrel family is a unit held together without definite social mechanism. There is no recognized "head" of the family, nor are there any clearly formulated laws governing the transmission of the name-prerogatives. Before death a man usually calls together his relatives and bequeaths,[7] according to his desire, his personal property to sisters and uncles, and his intangible property to heirs. Such a designation does not become the property of the new owner unless he is able to validate his ownership by a distribution of presents, customarily the name is "dead." If, during this period, some other member of the uncorrel family should desire it for a child, or for himself, he can take possession of it by the customary distribution of presents. In doing so he would anger the bereaved, but the bereaved cannot himself use the appellation since it is already in use. Even at the present time there are bitter quarrels over the assumption of names, and such have certainly occurred for many generations. If a man can validate fairly promptly a name willed to him, it is more unusual for anyone else to try to demand him.

If a man dies intestate, his sons consider themselves his natural heirs, and the most respected of them validates for himself as many names as he desires or is able to assume. Disputes are not as common as might be expected since the influence of a chief is usually sufficient to settle claims as to which of his brothers shall receive which name. Even if none of them is a chief, some one of them is certain to have greater influence than the others. If a dead man has no sons, his daughters can name his nephew, which they may transmit to their children. Failing both sons and daughters, a man's brothers and sisters are his heirs, as usual, the use of influence being the one who really arranges matters.[illegible] Where the law, it must be emphasized, that if the members of the immediate family are slow to validate a dead man's names, they may be taken by any member of the extended family.

In former days it was customary to create a "remembrancer" to preserve the ancestral myth. The elder and more influential members of the extended family would choose an intelligent young relative to whom the myth is given details. One informant described how his mother, the last official "remembrancer," had been instructed by her grandfather. The old man had been accustomed to take his granddaughter, a girl about twelve years of age, to bed with him, and whisper to her the myth, with his hand pressed over her mouth to prevent escape of his words. In the conclusion of the recitation he always spat in her mouth to make the words stick. The members of the extended family, recognizing that the "remembrancer" was the person best acquainted with the myth, were wont to consult him as he alone is, and of course, alone the names embodied in it. A "remembrancer" had no authority to decree who should receive names, but opinions were often made to him, and a tactful individual was frequently able to settle disputes.

Considering the extreme fluidity of the whole system it is surprising that quarrels are not more common. These are limited by the system of wills, through which a man bequeaths his most valuable personal property, especially his intangible property to twelve name-grandchildren (II, p. 4). Ancestral

Such instances of an ancestral

[illegible] ancient, are unusual; normally, the group is largely centered in one village, but with members scattered in other localities. There is no central organization. It is generally recognized that such a unit belongs to the village where its first ancestors settled, and the leading chief of that village is, therefore, an important person in the family, though without status of "head" of it. His advice may be appealed to in cases of disputes concerning names, but he lacks judicial authority. Theoretically, the descendants of the elder of two first people are considered as "elder brothers and elder sisters" of those descended from a younger brother or sister; but this is nothing more than an accepted fact, it plays no part in the social life of the community.

In addition to human names, the origin myths include those applied to dogs. The first ancestral group had dogs, and these animals had names, or were given them by their powerful ancestors. Even since that time their descendants can apply these designations to their own dogs. It is unnecessary to enumerate such names, but no two canines can be given the same one at the same time, according to the rule which governs the bestowal of human names. This matter was not investigated in detail, and the only dog's name collected was one for which the origin myth is as follows:

When Tsi'a was first settled in the beginning of time, the houses were built in parallel rows, one above the other, up the side of a steep hill. At the very top was a cedar house, built over such a steep incline that accidents called down the hillside. In consequence, one of the early chiefs living there gave to his dog the name, Nalqimmal ti mual, "falling accidents," which has since been preserved in the ancestral family of the descendants.

[illegible]

Great difficulty was experienced in obtaining information about land names. The Bella Coola owners hotly the way in which their land has been occupied by white settlers without, according to their standpoint, proper compensation. Quite is a more obvious social grouping than the ancestral family, though it is of the latter that a man is most proud. The member of a small, unimportant village often describes himself as a native of a neighboring, larger one where at a distance from his home, simply as a matter of convenience.

Even before the coming of the white man, village sites were abandoned and people took up their residence with friends or relatives elsewhere. In fact, mythology contains instances of such migrations at the very beginning of time. In cases of this kind, memory of the earlier home has been preserved for many generations, and may perhaps be the explanation of the many villages which are described as two, and which have two names. In the early days immigrants were always to have been welcomed; they added to the numerical strength of the village, and the original inhabitants enjoyed boasting to the newcomers of their descent from the first settlers. Since any group forced to abandon their own homes naturally moved to those of relatives, there is no difficulty in understanding the process by which they continued to intermarry with their new neighbors. Thus two, or even more ancestral families, inhabiting one village tended to form a closely inter-related stock. In rare instances, two unrelated ancestral families may have become inhabitants of the same village, which would ultimately lead to intermarriage.

In most cases the endogamic tendencies already described cause the village community to be largely members of one ancestral family. In addition there are always other occupants: strangers who have fled from their homes and sought refuge among the Bella Coola, the offspring of their intermarriage with slaves, guests, foreigners, especially Carriers temporarily resident in Bella Coola, and finally slaves, without status in the community. The real inhabitants, those whose power is firmly planted in the village, are the reputed descendants of the first group of settlers, and accordingly a relative coming to dwell in a village usually endeavours to obtain a name from the origin myth of the ancestral family occupying it, and then establish himself with the traditions of his new home. This is another illustration of the peculiarl tendency of the whole organization.

Politically, the village is the most important Bella Coola unit. Usually, though not always related to one another, the inhabitants are always friends. If an attack is made on a village by a hostile war-party, all the inhabitants suffer equally. On the other hand, if the residents decide to attack another settlement, there is no compulsion for anyone to share the burden. Each individual, with the exception of slaves, follows his own inclination. In the case of murder or other wrong inflicted by an individual, the responsibility rests on his immediate family, not the village. Factions within the village seem to have been uncommon; individual rebellions were common, and often led to murder, but if a family became unpopular or considered itself aggrieved, it usually moved to another village. Neighboring settlements were generally on friendly terms and often assisted each other in war, but this was not compulsory. Indeed, cases are known in which a war-party from the same town, about to attack land, passed within a quarter of a mile of Bonaparte without its inhabitants even warning their threatened neighbours.

So far as internal organization is concerned, the village is as fluid a unit as are most Bella Coola groupings. If one individual has attained a position of eminence through the potlatch system (vol. I, chap. iv), he is "chief" of the village, and his advice is generally followed. If several men have approximately the same importance, there is no dominating figure. In any case, a chief lacks executive authority, and such obedience as he receives is due to his personal influence. Some slight deference is paid to the man who uses the name of the eldest of the four group of brothers, the low chief, but there are sufficient chiefs to warrant the title of "chief" with the significance usually attached to the term. The important members of the village are accustomed to meet for the discussion of ceremonial mat-family are liable. It is very rare for a woman to be killed in a blood feud. A death is avenged by a death. If two persons should be slain for one murder the family which has suffered the double loss endeavours to kill another of their enemies. In case of wounding, an effort is made to wound the offender, but if he should be killed his family would try to avenge him. More often, one of the offender's family takes the initiative of offering goods to the injured family, "to cure the wound." If the offer is accepted, and the goods delivered properly, the matter is at an end. If a murder is committed within the circle of the immediate family, for instance, if a brother kill a brother, revenge, if exacted, must be meted out to the actual offender. If approved to do so, the leading chief of a village may offer his advice, but it is always considered that revenge concerns only the immediate family.

Revenge is a right which shows clearly the essential limits of the family. There are no well-defined degrees of relationship within which responsibility exists. Instead, everyone knows, in the open life of the community, how many persons share the family life of the individual, and they alone are held to account, or they alone demand compensation. Even in very serious, the family must be a bilateral unit which, when powerful, stretches out to church members of the sentimental families of both mother and father.

Not only does the family thus appear consequently to be extending to half members of the sentimental family of other persons, but these relatives themselves are deeply concerned in the affairs of the family. This is most clearly shown in the case of children who, of course, are members of the sentimental family of both their mother and father. A few days after birth some relative is expected to call together the people of the village where the child is born for the honoured and valuable due of an unusual name. It is considered an evidence of poverty if this is done by the father, as if the child were only recognized by the parents, not by a larger circle of relatives. It is immaterial whether this gathering be called by a relative of the father or the mother. In June, 1910, a Bella Coola girl had reached the age of about six months without having received a name. There was much adverse criticism about the parsimony of her father's father and her mother's father, who were held equally to blame, but who had really been deterred by fear of the law prohibiting the potlatch.

As a child grows older he is helped in the performance of ceremonial rites by his parents and by their brothers and sisters. In this way, it is considered a mark of poverty if only the parents take part. If a man's own children do not appear likely to carry on the traditions of his ancestral family, a boy [558] no hesitation in favouring the children of either a brother or sister, since, like his own, they are all members of the same [614] ancestral family. Especially in Kimsquit[1] it is customary for a man to help his sisters' children, not that there is any lack of knowledge of the real father, but rather as a mark of respect and family feeling displayed by a man to his sister. Moreover, [553] in both Bella Coola proper and in Kimsquit, it is not improper for a name which a man has raised to a position of dignity by the expenditure of much goods to be passed to his own son, it should go to a distant relative. When a father relinquishes a name for his child it should be one long distant.

The aspect of the manner in which the family escape impoverishing into the ancestral family can be seen in the distribution of names. When a man calls his relatives together to make his will he is guided in the choice of recipients by the characteristics of his children. The child can receive much from his father, but boy children are slighted without hesitation. This is particularly true of names with which are bound up valuable dance prerogatives, whereas, as previously mentioned, ancestral names of which the importance depends on the value of the goods distributed in connection with them, usually revert to the ancestral family and can be revived by any member of it. It seems needless to publish lengthy pedigrees, illustrating the transmission of ancestral names; it will suffice to say that such sometimes pass from father to son, from a man to his brother's son, his sister's son, his sister, his daughter, or to other relatives belonging to the immediate family. On the other hand, with equal frequency, names pass from a man to distant relatives of the same ancestral family.

Thus the Bella Coola family, important though it is in the life of the individual, cannot be defined with exactitude either as regards composition or functions; it varies according to the importance of its head, and tends to merge in the ancestral families of the parents.

Kinship Terms

In Bella Coola, as in so many parts of the world, kinship terms mirror the social life of the community. The Bella Coola system of nomenclature is not so clear-cut in its application as in other regions, and requires considerable explanation concerning the uses of many of the terms. It will be seen that the system, although fundamentally founded on the family, preserve many classificatory features. Whether or not these are to be ascribed to an ancient class system is most doubtful; a short discussion of that point will be found at the end of this section.

The terms are arranged in the following order: first, an individual's relatives of the preceding generation, then those of the next preceding, with their parents, then those of the present generation, followed by terms for his of the generations following. Finally come relatives by marriage.

[illegible] In case of adoption, the same kinship terms are used as if the adopted person were a member of the family by birth. A more complicated situation arises when a child who is regarded as the reincarnation (2, p. 616) of a recently deceased elderly relative, is given the latter's name. In such a case the child is addressed by the kinship terms applicable to his namesake. In recent years, at any rate, this application is without social significance, and, as far as could be learned, this has always been the case. Bella Coola sentiment is that it is fitting for a child to receive the name of one of its ancestors. When a person sees the child, and thinks of his name, he thinks of the late deceased, hence it is natural to use kinship terms accordingly. This is more obvious when the child is regarded as a reincarnation, though even in such a case he does not receive any of the marks of respect paid to his namesake; the reincarnation is physical, not social. In course of time this is forgotten and the child takes his place among others of his own generation, though it may be remembered in theoretical question of ancestral reincarnation.

The kinship terminology of the Bella Coola contains features of the family and classificatory systems. The reciprocal terms for parents and children-in-law, brothers and sisters-in-law, lack of sex differentiation for brothers and sisters, and the importance of age in the designations applied to persons of the same generation, are all features of the classificatory system. On the other hand, bilateralism, failure to the writer was in Bulu Coulu, a non-commercial entertainment was given one evening at which several men sang and performed. The writer was asked to sing a Bulu Coulu song, which he did in the belief that it was not one that was incorporated in the ancestral myth of anyone. Unfortunately, his teacher had erred, and as soon as the song was completed an old woman arose and stated that it belonged to her ancestral family. She avoided the difficulty of its singing by immediately announcing that the singer was her "son." Thus the writer was adopted into a Bulu Coulu family, a circumstance which aided him considerably in collecting information. This did not alter the fact that a ceremonial song had been sung. Accordingly, the women gave presents to the guests, thereby legalizing the adoption, and saving herself from the disgrace of having one of her songs used as if it were a matter of no consequence, free to anyone.

[illegible]

Presents are also a means of obtaining name. Every Bulu Coulu has at least one name embodied in an ancient myth. A man who wishes to become a chief can do so only by giving lavish presents to make his designation "strong," "free," or "bright," to use Bulu Coulu expressions. Such gifts increase the importance of the owner's name, and they obtain for him the right to a more, more or less definitely located, in the house. Since all Bulu Coulu habitations are built on similar lines, a man can occupy his wanted position when announced to a ceremony in any house. The validating of ancestral names and the acquisition of more are among the important factors which cause or prolongs.

In the beginning of time, when the first people were sent down to populate the earth, it is announced that each who established a village, consisting of a single house, secured himself in the best spot within the dwelling, namely the central position behind the fire. His younger relatives ranged either beside him the food and goods distributed, since it was winter and the people were in dire straits on account of the destruction of all their crops. In consequence, the uncle decided to make a new name for his nephew, Shimi, "Charred Wood." By virtue of the goods expended this name became an honorable title, and was maintained by lavish presents. Any similar incident connected with a potlatch can be made the origin of a designation. Another example of a manufactured name is one derived from a peculiarity of the man giving the potlatch. A number of years ago a chief was joined in by his associates on account of the frequency with which he had to visit the toilet. When now he gave a potlatch he created the name Ajiwi'a, "The Toilet One," and gave great dignity to the designation by generosity.

Since a name is valuable only on account of the goods expended in obtaining it with respect to a certain name, it is obvious that names and ranks are closely associated. A man who wishes his son to succeed to his own location in the house owns the crests, as has been described, at his feet. It may be a matter of years before he actually takes his father's position, but during that time he is treated with respect, he is still a commoner, but it is recognized that his parent considers him likely to "make good" and become a true chief by ability to give generously. Should he fail to do so, necessarily his influence wanes, in spite of his name and duly ordained rank. He keeps the latter, but it is no longer considered one of importance. Thus, too, the course of names from generation to generation is a series of curves, sometimes one is on a pinnacle of glory, other, "made among" by a powerful chief, but in the next generation it may fall to the dust through ownership by a weakling. In the Haida Circle reposes it. It has become hereditarily[illegible].

A name is rarely established in a man, and usually only when a chief has no son or other man with descendants. In such a case the nephew or sister's name and has the same status as a male chief. In the present time one important

554 chief had thus obtained a seat for his daughter, as well as one
* 556 for his two sons. But usually a woman continues to use the 562 ancestral name given to her in infancy until she is able to [553] assist her husband in a potlatch, when a name is validated for her (see I, p. 470). The ancestral names of the first women to occupy this earth are reserved for women and, like men's names, vary in prestige according to the prowess of their [55] owners. Most names given to children, though embodied in origin myths, are applicable to either sex; and these are the common designations of women. Cases are known in which a woman has assumed an ancestral name if her brother has allowed it to fall into disrepute through failure to give potlatches.

554 With such a fluid system, no fixed line can be drawn be-
* 556 tween chief and commoner. But after his fourth potlatch a 622 man's influence in the community has become so great that [552] he will usually feel justified in having the carpenters make for him a material seat. There is nothing to prevent a person having one made for him before he has given the requisite number of potlatches, but too rapid assumption may render him liable to the scorn of the community through his failure to show himself sufficiently "strong." The contempt shown [624] to anyone attempting to usurp too lofty a place is a strong deterrent to a proud young man.

[592] On the material seat are carved the man's ancestral crests, [562] in other words the forms in which his first ancestors came to earth, or some of the beings with whom they came in contact. To show these is a matter of pride, but unless the display is fittingly validated, the man's own dignity will be lowered, as well as that of his ancestors. Construction of a seat is particularly common when a man is establishing himself in the central position behind the fire, and claims this to be where his first ancestor sat. Others among the first people may have chosen seats in other parts of the house, and in these, likewise, a man who is taking his ancestral name may have a material seat constructed. Establishment in such a position increases a chief's feeling of mental superiority, as if strength-

184 476 * 556 standardized. Boys and girls helped their parents, and there was no definite age at which they ceased to do so. The fluidity of the Bella Coola system was contrary to any standardization. The more important a chief became, the more did he receive from dependent relatives, but the more did they expect in the way of "return presents." It was advantageous to be generous, within the family circle as well as without, since life was so public that every transaction even of a "private" nature, was well known. Unquestionably, a greedy and strong-minded individual must frequently have taken advantage of help from his housemates, but there was no strict code of ethics in regard to this. In brief, it may be said that the acquisition of wealth was as unstandardized, individual, matter; its distribution was likewise according to individual volition, although within a rigidly defined tribal pattern.

Sound Security

551 * 556 576 614 [549] The ancestral names that chiefs desire to raise to a position of eminence are usually embedded in myths dealing with the first settlement of this earth, names which belong, as has been stated, to the ancestral family. Many of these traditions record other designations as well, each of which carries with it the prerogative of performing a type of dance known as sound. These will be spoken of, henceforth, as sound names. The Bella Coola do not know the meaning of this term. These [553] names, like ancestral ones, are the potential property of members of the ancestral family, but can only be assumed when duly validated by presents. Such an assumption follows a 553 * 554 576 [549] period of seclusion in the back-room of the house. Both men and women are eligible. A person may be secluded in this way a number of times, acquiring a new sound name on each occasion, but as presents must be distributed every time, it follows that only the children or relatives of wealthy chiefs can be so favoured. It is desirable to have the bestowal of a sound name occur at a potlatch, since guests from foreign tribes are then powers, and the fame of the initiate is thereby carried further afield than would be possible if only Bella Coola were in attendance. Every individual duly included and given a sumé name feels himself communically allied to others who have had a similar experience, and they form a grouping which may be termed the sumé secret society. 553 ● 564 * 575

The close connection between this society and chiefs is obvious from the presence of names of each type in the same ancestral myths. None the less, every chief, that is a person with duly validated ancestral name and seat, is not a sumé, unless he has validated a sumé name for himself and undergone the period of seclusion. Conversely, a man may be a duly authorized member of the sumé although lacking a seat and the other marks of chiefdomship. The relationship is, however, so close that the Bella Coola think of the sumé society as a society of chiefs. Sumé dances take place at potlatches and funerals, and occasionally at gatherings of less importance. Difficulties arise at the death of a chief who has failed to use some of his goods for the acquisition of a sumé name. Such a case took place at the death of an important Bella Coola in the summer of 1923. Theoretically, he was ignorant of sumé rites, but after much discussion these were used on account of his importance as a sumé chief, an instance of the manner in which a man's personal importance over-rules ceremonial decorum. 575 622 [553] [596] [966] [183]

The Bella Coola believe that only some of their sumé name-prerogatives came to this earth at the beginning of time with their first ancestors, and that many more have been acquired later by supernatural experiences. These were especially common among their forbears as they ranged over this earth making places to settle in the beginning of time. No sumé name can be assumed casually; each must have had a specific origin. There are few sumé origin myths, though theoretically there should be one to account for every name. The explanation appears to lie in the undoubted fact that many sumé prerogatives have been acquired comparatively recently 424 531 675 973 [779]

* 556 Although guests from different tribes are sometimes invited 574 to other ceremonials, it is at potlatches that they are essential.
Since the validity of such transactions as marriages, divorces, [205] or the assumption of professional prerogatives depends on the presence of witnesses, and since the importance of such a rite depends on the number of witnesses, a man is always eager to carry out any public performance at a potlatch when he is sure of the attention of foreigners, and the consequent wider diffusion of knowledge of what he has done. The man who has invited guests is usually willing to allow others to perform at his potlatch, since it increases the complexity and importance [184] of the affair. It follows that no two potlatches are alike; one will contain features entirely lacking in another. Moreover, the wealth of the donor determines how many rites he himself will cause to be performed. The fundamental concept of the potlatch is the inviting of guests from abroad to witness rites [144] in connection with an ancestral myth, especially the return of a recently deceased relative of the donor to visit the living.

* 556 At any important potlatch the following rites are carried 946 out, and in the account of the ritual it will be assumed that these above are taking place. If the reader bears this summary in mind, he is less likely to be confused by the complication of rites.

(1) The return of a dead ancestor to visit the living.

[575] (2) The initiation of young men or women into the nuxalk [533] society. This includes the validation of a nuxalk name for each, and a period of seclusion in the back-room. The initiates may either be relatives of the donor of the potlatch, or young persons whose relatives are taking the opportunity to carry out the rite in the presence of foreigners. Some of the initiates may already be members of the society, undergoing a further period of seclusion in order to increase their status by a further distribution of presents.

[513] fiction, though necessary to maintain the status of the children.

bear on the wall of his house, or an ancestral name. The speaker always recounts the whole myth before announcing which portion of it is transmitted to X as a prerogative. It is understood that this transference will be duly validated by presents to X when he gives his potlatch. Such are termed dzémènumtnum and signify the repurchase of a wife from her husband. Though this is known to be a fiction it has extreme social importance. Unless dzémènumtnum is paid there is an ineradicable blot upon the children; in fact, it is one of the essentials of a legal marriage. All prerogatives thus transferred on sléstnum become the property of X and will in time pass to his children, unless recalled to the wife's family by further repurchase (dzémènumtnum) money or goods. In this fashion elements of family myths become scattered, and one of the considerations in choosing a wife is to select a woman able to bring back some missing part of the husband's myth. 556* 425 583 [581]

The usual present is an ancestral name, which X henceforth uses as potlatches as his most distinguished title, though the myth in which it is incorporated does not belong to him. As long as the name remains in X's family those who originally owned it are unable to make use of it. Such a name is said to be "dragged across" by the wife to her husband, the immense weight or importance of the designation being compared with the dragging of a heavy log. Occasionally, the father of a married woman, animated by the kindliest feelings towards his son-in-law, may give him outright a myth with all the names embodied therein. This can happen only where there are no other survivors of the family. In such a case when the myth is recounted it must always be mentioned how it has been obtained. The number and type of the prerogatives transferred depend upon the sentiments with which his wife's family regard X. If, in addition to being a worthy man, he is member of their ancestral family, or of one with which his wife's has frequently intermarried, so that in course of generations prerogatives have intermingled, there is less objection to giving him such rights than if he were an unrelated individual. [553] [551] 556* 425 606 553

553 * 556 425 [606] [532] A man may receive so many prerogatives with regard to house painting that he has to continue the designs on the sides of his dwelling, or he may receive so many figures for a totem-pole that he can erect one of composite pattern. X may acquire prerogatives not only from his father-in-law, but from his mother-in-law, and if he is the husband of several wives, the family of each may contribute something. If, for some inexplicable reason, X is not given any prerogative from the family of his wife, he uses one of his own ancestral myths with the names belonging thereto. A man who gives many potlatches can choose to validate numerous family names for himself, or to concentrate on one alone, elevating it to a position of great importance. But any names he validates must belong to his [615] family; it is contrary to custom for a Bella Coola to steal a name to which he has no right.

*556 782 At this, or some other suitable time, X prays for assistance in the complicated rites that are to follow. Taking four pieces of pounded and dyed cedar-bark, and four pieces of undyed bark, he places on each a small quantity of food and throws the eight into the fire. Likewise he may throw in four small pieces of any kind of goods. As he does so he appeals to the supreme god:

"Please strengthen my spirit for the many duties which are before me."

[756] Instead of praying himself, X may ask a shaman to do so for him, in the belief that the latter's supplication will be more efficacious.

*556 688 628 The necessity for supernatural assistance lies in the fact that any serious error or disaster in the performance of potlatch rites calls for summary punishment, since X has allowed ceremonial sisook knowledge to reach the uninitiated. In such a case the duty of meting out a penalty falls upon the members of a foreign tribe. Nothing is said at the time, but the departing guests take away with them information of what has happened. Great latitude is allowed as to who shall be the chastisers. The guests may be related to X and the members

* 552 [575] [981] The sisi returns to the house and tells the guests that Mulaklile has indeed been near and has promised to return later on. Those who are not nusak, being steeped in the belief concerning the omnipresence of supernatural beings and ignorant of the carefully concealed whistles, readily credit the tale that they have heard the voice of a denizen of the land above, whose language is intelligible to the sisi. Thus is the supernatural element of the potlatch first called forth.

After a final distribution of food, the guests return to their homes.

THE INITIATION OF NUSAK NEOPHYTES

* 556 575 [609] At a potlatch valuable presents are given to the foreign guests, but it is unthinkable for the donor to give to his fellow-villagers. Accordingly, if X desires to display his generosity towards them, he does so at a preliminary ceremony, when he begins the initiation, or re-initiation, into the nusak society of any number of young people. After elaborate counting and re-counting of his goods, both those actually stored in his house and those promised,* X decides that he has sufficient to initiate, for example, seven neophytes. His first choice will be his own children, failing those, the sons and daughters of a brother or sister, or of his wife's relatives, or, if none of these are available, those of a friend. X does not gain any pecuniary advantage from such a transaction, in fact he loses, but the prestige attached outweighs this consideration.

"Is it not the privilege of a chief to be generous?" say the Bella Coola.

He approaches the parents of those whom he has selected, always members of old-established families. As it is to the [553] social advantage of a young person to be a nusak, a father usually tells X a nusak name, dormant in his family, which he wishes to have conferred on his son, and how much he is willing to contribute for the purpose. In many cases, a man will preservation of an air of mystery by keeping out of sight of 556*

those who are not nawt. Food is brought to them, and mem- 579 bers of the society are free to enter the room at any time. Some of the older men enlighten T and his fellows with regard to the secret rites, and especially to the human origin of the whistle. Proud of his new status, an initiate never dreams of transmitting this information to those who are not members of the society. As a privilege, the neophytes are sometimes allowed to go out at night, care being taken that no uninitiated person shall see them. The length of the period of confinement varies according to the number of young people to be admitted, and on the actual time of the potlatch; the minimum duration is about two weeks, the maximum, four months. Sometimes the tediousness is lightened by the arrival of carpenters who have chosen this secret place to work at the nawt masks. After all the initiates have been confined to the back-room, X [538] continues to invite people to his house at frequent intervals to practise their songs. On each occasion food is distributed, so that the meetings are expensive to the host, but no donor grumbles about it, as thereby he establishes his prestige as a chief.

THE VALIDATION OF NAWT NAMES

The next event is the validation of the initiates' nawt 553 ● names,* a ceremony termed ne'ondiku. X, with the assis- 556* tance of his family, piles on the floor of his house the goods 575 which he intends to use for this purpose. In the old days these consisted of skins, blankets, food, baskets, bowls, slaves (symbolized by stones), canoes (symbolized by sticks), and so on. Nowadays, money is used. Towards dusk a herald summons [208]
the people to X's house. For many years it has been customary to invite everyone, but it is said that long ago only the nawt would have been present. When all are seated, [537]

without special places, X calls upon some eloquent friend to direct the distribution of the money. This speaker states how X is carrying out the vow incumbent on his noble and exalted station, how all honour him for so doing, and how all should strive to follow his example. He then says that to give strength to the name Sqaqmaxila, for example, X will give away, say $100. He further announces who have contributed this amount: perhaps $50 from X, and the other half from various relations of X. If the sum in question be large it is always mentioned from whom, and how the donor has obtained the money. Thus every financial transaction becomes publicly known, and the more prominently a man figures, the greater is his prestige. Next, the amount to be used for the second initiate's name is announced, with the same details, and in like fashion the sum decided upon for each successive initiate.

Thus the total amount is distributed among the guests by the heralds, under X's supervision. He usually gives everyone the same amount; men sometimes receive more than women, but in every case members of the same sex receive an equal sum. The Bella Coola are not expert mathematicians, so that faulty division is the rule. If X, for example, decides to give $1.50 to each person present, it is a time of considerable anxiety while the stack of bills is being reduced, to watch whether or not there will be the exact amount. If X finds out he is short he will hastily borrow some money, as it would be an insult to omit anyone. If the amount be too great, he will use the surplus in making presents to the more influential guests.

With the exception of this possible surplus, the money distributed is regarded as an outright present; "it has flowed away to make good the boys' names" is the Bella Coola expression. A chief will remember how much he has received, and if he wishes to uphold or to increase his own dignity, he will make a point of returning at least an equivalent to X on some future occasion. But though in effect he may make return, such is never said to be the case. "The money has flowed away."

Poor people, white guests, or others from whom no return can possibly be received, share equally in the distribution; the money goes to all to validate the transaction. On the other hand, it appears that the presents, if any, made to a few individuals after the general distribution, will be conferred with interest. In selecting the recipients of these he has been influenced, first, by the necessity of repaying old debts, and secondly by his desire to make good investments in the shape of presents to those likely to show their chiefly return by returning with heavy interest. No request is ever made for such repayment, but as the transaction has been publicly witnessed, a man fears to fail to repay, since that would lower his prestige. No one may refuse a present, no matter how embarrassing it may be.

After the gifts have been distributed the songs of the initiates are practised. Members of the sound society join in with the singers; the other spectators have attentively, full of interest, but take no part. K with his helpers then gives food to all, and they depart.

Before the coming of the white man a potlatch was a rare event, and sound members were initiated at local gatherings. The period of confinement was the same as that just described, but instead of merely practising the songs during the interval, the initiates appeared and danced to them. It will be convenient here to describe that ritual, emphasizing the fact that at a potlatch, where the initiates can be confirmed in the presence of foreign guests, this preliminary rite does not take place.

After the distribution of goods the singers beat out* the tune of any one of the initiates, and all emerge in close succession from the back-room, each wearing a blanket, without distinctive design, a collar of dyed and pounded cedar-bark decorated with pendant wapiti skins, and the distinctive sound head-dress (see Plate 1).† This consists of a circlet of grizzly bear claws, surmounted in front by a small forehead mask; from the inner side of the circlet there rise a number of sea-lion the last songs they have made for the initiates, and any of the usual members of the audience desiring to "help" the initiates dance to them, even X himself on occasion. By "help" no material aid is indicated; such dancing merely displays a friendly and sympathetic interest. The initiates, emphasized to avoid head-dress, appear at the door of the back-room, and sometimes dance a few steps. Occasionally, at the conclusion of his song, a lad's parents, or other relatives, bring forward the goods which will be later distributed by X to the guests. On other occasions, this is reserved for the following day. Food is distributed and all disperse.

THE POTLATCH: SECOND DAY

On this, one of the two most important days of the whole ceremony, the following rites take place.

During the Day

(a) Communication to the foreign guests of the new nuxuk names of the initiates concealed within the back-room; these names are the ones that have been made known to the Bella Coola before the potlatch proper.

(b) Payment to X by the members of his wife's family of the goods necessary to ransom her from her husband.

During the Evening

(c) Repayment by X of debts owed to members of his own village.

(d) Return of a dead relative of X to visit the living.

(i) Distribution of presents to validate this appearance.

(ii) In some cases, dancing by some of the nuxuk initiates.

Early in the morning X gives each of his guests a washbasin with the other necessary appurtenances for cleaning up, and towards noon all of those invited reassemble in his house. Three river canoes have been brought in and are ranged, two parallel to the side walls, and one parallel to the back wall, all far enough out to permit people to sit behind them. Boxes containing large quantities of red elderberries and olachen grease have been placed in readiness. X selects as many 556* youths as the number on whom he intends to confer the names 575 which have already been announced and validated among the 553 Bella Coola, but are now to be made known to the foreign guests. He meets the lads, who are to substitute for the initiates, on the various boxes. Everybody understands that these are merely representations. X requests two chiefs to act as his announcers, choosing two with good voices and abundant self-confidence. To one of these X whispers the sacred name of one of the initiates.

"His name is now——" calls out the announcer, pointing to one of the substitutes, and the listeners readily recognize the initiate intended, from the use, in conjunction with his new designation, of his well-known ancestral name. The lowlife [203]
repeat the new name with the usual bodings, so that it becomes well known to all present. In like manner the sacred name given to each initiate is publicly announced. The substitutes receive no advantage from their part in the proceedings.

Then the boxes are opened and red elderberries poured into 556*
the canoes in front of the guests. Stones are provided with 324 which the visitors pound the fruit into pulp which they proceed to mix with their hands, as eulachon grease and cranberries [252] are added. Then X's helpers distribute spoons and the feast commences. All start to eat, but after an interval one of the leading Bella Coola chiefs strikes the side of his canoe with a spoon, as a signal that all must stop. X has several dishes in [415] readiness. If he is wealthy some of these will be carved in the [532] shape of beaver, eagle, or other form in which an ancestor appeared. These dishes are filled with the food which all have been eating and then placed before the principal chiefs, who thus have a second supply. At this point the singers begin to 533 beat out an ancient song of the type known as se-ala. Each 556* of these has been handed down from the distant past, when some chief, ancestor of X, had it composed for himself at a potlatch. The theme is always about the form or fame of his [171] fame to spread beyond his village. These goods are then distributed among the guests, and are not returnable, as they are said to have "become nothing" for X's sent. He may nevertheless humbly himself in the giving of these presents. 551*

The next scene is the strengthening, or initial establishment, of seats for some of X's younger relations, in many cases including those concealed within the back-room. It is not necessary for him to do this, nor need he do so for all, unless he desires. The parents of the youths have been consulted as to the ancestral names which each is to receive, embodied in an ancestral myth. On the other hand, X may choose to establish in a seat some young man whom he has not initiated into the ranks of the ozuak. The two actions are distinct, though closely related. 553* 554*

X picks out a place at the side of the house for one of the initiates, whom it will be convenient to designate as Y. Another youth acts as a substitute for Y, whether or not he is within the back-room. The substitute is recognized as such, and receives no social or pecuniary advantage from his position. He stands near the door till the speaker calls upon him to enter, as if he had newly come into the house. He is surrounded by the ozuak name recently announced for Y. After consultation with X the announcer calls out that henceforth Y's name is So-and-So, giving an ancestral one dormant in Y's family, and that his seat is where he is now sitting. The family of Y contribute to the strengthening of his seat, in fact X himself may not provide any portion of the goods expended. The speaker, prompted by some member of Y's family, gives the general outline of the myth in which the name is featured, and concludes with a polite speech expressing the hope that Y may rise to the fame of the first holder of the name he now wears.

Then one of the heralds calls out, "Y's seat is too hard!"

Someone, Y's father, mother, or other relative, X or his wife, brings forward goods to soften his seat.

"Y's neck is unsupported," cries another of the heralds.

When goods are brought forth. In the fashion all kinds of things are bestowed: a copper, "to support Y's back"; a moose-skin, "to shield him from the fire"; two slaves, "to make him strong and heavy so he moves about the earth"; a pile of blankets, "to provide a cape to keep him warm"; more goods, "to give him shoes"; some cloth, "to wipe his mouth after eating"; and other things to provide him with fuel, baggage, and so on. The family of Y keep telling the lavishly that they have more goods, so that he knows how long to continue his complaint about Y's needs.

As soon as all the available goods have been piled up, they are given to the guests, who are witnesses of the validation of the name and seat in the house. Theoretically, the value of the presents received by each is not affected by the rank of the recipient. X decides whether or not each guest shall receive a present of like value, or whether men shall receive more than women. Owing to the difficulty of accurate estimation of the amount required, there is often a residue, which is given away to the more important chiefs. These goods are strictly not returnable. They are spoken of as having "become nothing," with reference to the name and seat in question.

Exactly the same procedure is carried out for every young person whom X wishes to start or to validate in his seat. Parents take advantage of a potlatch to "strengthen" their children in this way, and X never refuses a request for participation. It is always announced whence have come the goods for distribution, so that X receives no direct increase of fame, if they have been provided solely by the relatives of the youth, but, indirectly, his prestige is increased through the transaction having taken place at his potlatch.

It is at this time too that other names are validated. There will be usually a number of infants whose parents wish them to receive their first child names, such as are incorporated in the family myths. Likewise, men may be confirmed in their occupations, as warriors, singers, or other professions in which first established on his seat, he must reward the heralds lavishly for their services.

As with so many elements of culture, the Bella Coola ascribe the origin of heralds to the wish of Hemaxa as expressed to the first people in the beginning of time. Some groups of these early settlers brought with them heralds whose names had been created by the supreme deity himself in his house in the land above. Such a one was Sisqa'l who was a member of Kimsa-a's (3, p. 316) party at Kimsquit, another was Sqalmax who came with xnamxnam (3, p. 319). These heralds functioned in the manner of their descendants of today, others of the first chiefs appointed servants of their relations to perform this service, and by means of the power with which they were endowed, created names with respect to their functions. Besides his ordinary name every herald must have an ancestral appellation of some kind, as well as the probability of possessing hactat ones in addition to those of a professional nature. Either by bringing with them from above, or by creation on this earth, each group of first settlers became provided with a herald, whose name is embodied in the ancestral myth describing their experiences. As each of the first heralds died, his name was passed to a successor, and this practice has been carried out from generation to generation until the present. The Bella Coola state that no new names for heralds have been created since the time of the first people, and it is certain that none has been made for many years. Consequently, the number of heralds is strictly limited in accordance with mythological beliefs, and every man who owns one of the ancient designations embodied in an origin myth knows the name of the herald associated with his first namesake.

At the death of a herald his name becomes dormant. Since heralds function at all ceremonies, whether or not the donor belongs to the same ancestral family as themselves, the members of the group sustaining the loss are not deprived of their service. From the box, one of their prized properties, the visible embodiment of an element in their ancestral myth, is no longer present. In such circumstances, no member of an ancestral family would give a potlatch unless able to revive at it the dormant name in a new herald. The intending donor usually consults with the senior members of the ancestral family as to a suitable incumbent, or especially if he is an influential chief, he may simply use his own discretion. In either case, some relatively young member of the ancestral family is offered the post. If he accepts, the matter is settled; if not, another is invited to his stead. The new herald cannot function until his name and appointment have been validated by the distribution of presents at the potlatch. Such gifts are not returnable, since they are held to "have become nothing" for the name. Relatively lavish expenditure for this purpose is one of the many ways in which a chief is able to show his prowess and generosity. Thus established, a herald can carry out his duties thereafterwards. He functions at every ceremonial, but especially at potlatches given by members of his own ancestral family, in whose origin myth his own name is embodied. From frequent participation in all kinds of ceremonials, a herald becomes conversant with every type, and is appealed to as arbiter in difficult points of ritual, thus adding to his reputation.

Although acceptance of the post of herald somewhat curtails a man's activities in other respects, instances are known of energetic men using the gifts received to establish themselves as chiefs, passing on their herald names at the same time to other incumbents. More often, a herald uses his wealth for the benefit of a son or other relative, being satisfied with his own status in the community. He takes a prominent part in every ceremony and is a person of some standing, yet is spared the responsibility of actually giving rise himself, a position which offers many attractions to a man lacking great ambition and initiative.

424 as possible, a potlatch is the most suitable occasion. Goods 463 distributed for this purpose are not returnable; they have
* 556 "become nothing" to the acquisitor. The value of presents so borrowed differs enormously; a man who is proud of his prerogative validates it lavishly until he is strong in his vocation, whereas another establishes himself on a lesser scale. The origin [773] of professional rights, like so many of other kinds, is lost in antiquity and ascribed to the wishes of Alquntám as expressed to the first people. Some of the early settlers came to earth [551] with definite duties and vocations, each indicated by a special name; others, lacking these, created them through their own enormous power. At the death of one of these incumbents, 424 his name passed to one of his relatives who acted in the same 463 manner as his predecessor after duly validating the name in
● 533 question. Ever since that time, the owner of a confirmed pro-
* 556 fessional name has been able to perform the functions of the prerogative. This is never a man's sole designation, but merely [551] an addition to those of ancestral, hereditary, nuxsé, and other types. Like them, professional names are usually willed by their owners, though if this is neglected, one can be revived by any member of the deceased's ancestral family. In such a case, the older people usually decide on a suitable incumbent and suggest the matter to him; if he does not accept, the opportunity is given to another. If a member of the group is eager to validate the name, it is unlikely that anyone would try to [789] forestall him. Ability in certain respects can also be obtained by magical means (I, p. 701), and a member of the ancestral family so endowed is the natural choice for the prerogative in question.

Prerogatives of this kind can be grouped according to the types of vocation included.

THE PROFESSION OF RIVER GUARDIAN

his relatives. This punishment is customary in cases of the upsetting of a canoe. Death is the penalty for throwing refuse into the river, particularly during the summer, and until the coming of the white man the River Guardian exacted it without hesitation.

THE PREROGATIVE OF UTTERING A DRONING CRY

As the appearance of masked figures representing supernatural beings, whether in nuxalk or kwaxa dances, many of the women repeatedly utter a peculiar, high-pitched, droning cry which adds considerably to the weirdness and impressiveness of the occasion. Ability to do this depends on an ancestral prerogative duly confirmed by the distribution of presents. Many ancestral myths describe how some of the first women were given by Alpanism, or acquired in other ways, the right to drone, and mention is made of the name used by each with respect to this prerogative. Unlike the one previously described, many of the first women possessed this privilege, which is accordingly common at the present time. A name of this type is usually conferred in girlhood, sometimes even in infancy, and being of relatively slight importance may be validated at a ceremony of less dignity than a potlatch. One of these names is Nuxuqmbilaiqua-a, which has reference to the blue-green sheen of some abalone-shell brought from the east by Raven in the beginning of time, as described in the ancestral myth in which this name is included. For many years there has been considerable laxity with regard to this prerogative, and women lacking it have even been urged to drone in order to add to the solemnity of the occasion and to increase the wonder of the uninitiated.

There is another similar prerogative, enabling the incumbent to drone at mourning ceremonies. In the beginning of time, Smaaw of Kimsquit married Tlikwalil, the daughter of a Bella Bella chief, who had this right. It has since been transmitted from one of her descendants to another at Kimsquit.

than that of anyone else. The Bella Coola do not rationalize in a scientific manner; if a man holds a belief firmly, he acts on it without questioning its logic. Moreover, if a professional warrior functions a number of times, this in itself is enough to strengthen his conviction that he must act henceforth in the same way. It can be said with confidence that the owner of a professional prerogative has considerable belief in his own powers, that this acts on himself to render him proficient, and that the majority of the community have respect for his capabilities.

THE PROFESSION OF SINGER

Singing is one of the professions open to a Bella Coola either through natural ability or an ancestral prerogative. There is a constant need for men able to sing and compose songs for every kind of ceremonial, so a young man of talent has little difficulty in gaining admittance to the choir. He may even win great distinction and become recognized as the leading authority on musical matters. None the less, his success is considered to be accidental and unauthoritative, lacking the foundation that comes from the possession of a duly validated professional prerogative. A person made a singer by the latter means may be entirely unable to compose; in this case he is not a member of the choir, although he enjoys the social distinction which he has won by distributing goods to confirm his professional name. The singer most respected is he who combines with natural ability a confirmed prerogative to give substance and power to his position and compositions. At the death of such an one, an effort is always made by the members of his ancestral family to transmit the name to a youth who has shown musical promise. Arguments and differences of opinion are common among the members of the choir and in such cases the self-assurance and influence of a man whose position has been made strong by the distribution of presents often outweighs that of one who can rely only on his actual ability.

[illegible] ASSOCIATED WITH THE POSLATCH [illegible]

THE PRERQUISITES OF CARPENTRY

So with singers, there are many carpenters who ply their trade without the advantage of an ancestral prerogative. They, also, may be expert and receive credit for their skill, but they can never achieve quite the distinction that comes to a man who has been made a carpenter by the distribution of prerogatives. The latter may be as clumsy with tools that no one would ever trust him to make a canoe, or even a mask; but he is, socially, a carpenter, whereas a skilled artisan lacking a prerogative is admired for his ability but has no foundation of social esteem. In transferring a professional carpenter's name, however, an [559] effort is always made to give it to a youth with a bent in that direction.

The most esteemed carpenters are those who can make canoes, a trade which requires no special prerogative. In the beginning of time, Yaldzewat was the canoe-maker par excellence; he assisted many of the first people, and no one can have a professional prerogative as carpenter unless this supernatural being appears in his ancestral myth. The Bella Coola ascribe the skill of the Bella Bella in carpentry to the fact that Yaldzewat married a Bella Bella woman in the early period of the world and that many of that tribe are his descendants. In the old days, before the coming of the white man, carpenters were always respected as esteemed members of the community. Chiefs always cared for them, and they received abundant food at every ceremonial. None the less, they were not wealthy, and only in recent years, since the Bella Coola have realized the value put upon good craftsmanship by the white man, has it become customary to give valuable presents to carpenters. Ceremonially, they have considerable influence, since the carpenter who makes a mask usually decides who shall wear it and takes charge of the fitting and adjustment. He is also held responsible for any accident such as its falling when in use or for mechanical defects.

[illegible], naming. This can be described here, since, although not closely associated with the potlatch, it serves to teach children the principles of present-giving and hospitalities. February is the proper month for naming, although preliminary arrangements are made early in the winter. A chief who has a son or daughter about ten or twelve years of age may decide to use some of his food, and a small part of his wealth, for the benefit of the child. With the assistance of his relatives, the father begins making large numbers of toy canoes, miniature bows and arrows, small baskets, and models of all other types of articles commonly given away at potlatches. The manufacture of these requires several months, but towards the end of January they are nearly ready.

A name must then be chosen for the child. Since a naming-feast dance is a humorous, non-sacred affair, a naming name is not embedded in a myth, but is drawn from some story. Occasionally, parents decide on a new one, but more often the designation selected is one used for the same purpose by a grandparent of the child. There is no rivalry with regard to names of this type, and one of them can be re-used without asking consent of the last incumbent, although permission would never be refused. There must be a song with each name and the grandparents and other elderly relatives teach this to a number of boys who are to act as singers. The words may have been remembered from a previous occasion; if not, a simple theme is composed by one of the old people having some reference to the name about to be conferred. For example, one appellation of this type is Tepiwar, Fawn, and the accompanying words are:

"We hear that Deer has borne a child."

Another name is Epiw, Beaver, and the song: "Be of good cheer, the Beaver is coming."

A third song is, "Go outside under the house like a dog."

Occasionally a small incident in an ancestral myth is used. The teaching of the song to the juvenile singers is a source of constant merriment; the parents and grandparents are the

[533] receive, and the gifts they will acquire. Other lads are chosen to act as heralds, an effort being made in each case to pick those likely to pursue these professions.

[535] assembled, the boy singers beat out the donor's song and he dances to it. It may be in the nature of a nuuk, a'alk, or kusiut dance, according to the wishes of his parents. In many cases, one of the grandparents or some other old relative likewise dances to the song, using whatever style he chooses. There is no ceremonial significance to the ceremony and all enjoy themselves immensely, especially the adult guests. After
[556] the gifts have been handed round. The necessity for food and presents makes it impossible for any but the children of chiefs to enjoy this training.

After the ceremony, the children parade up and down the sidewalk in front of the houses, singing boisterously. The performance has been for their benefit and they wish to "show off." One night completes the affair, but the following afternoon another child may summon his comrades to a similar than the presents just given by X's relatives, though occasionally they may exceed them. Y's father, or a herald, or an eloquent friend on his behalf, speaks to the following effect: 583 584

"Be bold. Henceforth you will have to work a very long time for us. We will let you know when we need your services."

The significance of this speech lies in the fact that X, and to a certain extent his relatives, are expected to perform almost menial tasks for Y's father during the period of engagement, which has now been duly ratified. X's father and his followers now leave Y's house. It is immaterial whether or not X and Y themselves have been present. It is important that this formal acknowledgment of the engagement should take place during the day; otherwise any children resulting from the marriage could be shamed by having it said to them: "Your parents were not married in the open light of day." [858]

For a varying length of time X now acts almost as a servant to Y's father. He does not live with her family, but he cuts wood, draws water, and performs other menial tasks. Whenever a member of X's family gives a ceremony, he takes care to give lavish presents to Y's relatives. If it is impossible to hold a sacred rite, X's father is at least expected to invite Y's family to a ceremonial feast, and also to share with them any game that he may kill. Meanwhile, X and Y are not subject to any restrictions as to seeing each other. In theory if they should cohabit it would "spoil" the engagement, but in most cases when this occurs, as it often does, the matter is simply hushed up. [836]

Children whose parents were long engaged are said to be "heavy"; their entry into life having been prepared with careful thought and due ceremony, so that their limbs are clear to travel with success to the position of chief. When such a child is born, the relatives are eager to call their fellow-villagers to confer a name soon after birth, and the infant starts life with this advantage. There is no specific length of time for engagements; if X and Y are the children of influential chiefs, the 584 [858] [553]

584 preliminary agreement may have been made while they were only seven or eight years old, though marriage seldom occurs before the age of seventeen or eighteen. More often the agreement is made when X and Y have passed the age of puberty, and they wait for about two years before marrying.

583 Throughout this period, X's relatives are expected to give at 425 least one feast at which Y's relatives are the guests of honour, and always receive presents. At one of these rites X's father,
533 with the concurrence of his relatives, may mark his approval
[584] of the coming event by bestowing on Y's father, or one of her other relations, an ancestral name from his family myth. This does not become the absolute property of Y's family, since the myth in which it is embodied does not belong to them, unless, of course, they are members of the same ancestral family. It is fitting that a name of this kind be bestowed by the recipient on one of Y's children, or returned to X's family a few generations later by a return marriage. If this is not done, in course of time the designation is apt to be regarded by Y's family as their own. If there are no children, Y's relatives should give back the name to X's
[773] times be given outright, without thought of their use by the resultant children, or of their being restored by return marriages. It is claimed that the people of the Kimsquit River
[648] have, through such a present, the inalienable title to use a certain spot in the Kitlobe River for their olachen nets, and likewise the Kitlobe people have an irrevocable right to the Kimsquit name Stálkmy. These two prerogatives were transferred at the beginning of time. At present, anyone bestowing outright his family prerogatives would be considered weak-
[978] minded and the other members of the ancestral family would strenuously object. Considerations of this sort make it desirable to seek a wife within the ranks of the ancestral family.

During the period of engagement, Y's family may present a name, or names, to X's father, with the same conditions as those just described.

ancestry. He may wish to give X one of his ancestral names on this occasion, and if so, an eloquent speaker outlines the myth in which it is embodied, and announces that henceforth it belongs to X. He is called by it for the rest of the ceremony. Occasionally, X will receive several names, perhaps from different myths belonging to the different ancestral families of which Y is a member; or her father may grant X the especial use of some hunting-ground, although with the marriage he naturally has the right to use all belonging to his bride's ancestral family. Sisaok rarely, and kuziut prerogatives more commonly, may likewise be transmitted at this time, though they are never expounded, since some who are not members of these two societies may be present. X's father may likewise use his xe-tia song and follow it by giving an ancient name to Y; if so, the procedure is the same as that just described.

Names transferred by marriage may be given when the engagement is announced, at the actual wedding or, as will be explained later, when the wife is rebought from her husband. A transference from the family of X to the family of Y is made only as a mark of respect and friendly feelings, but a transference in the opposite direction is necessary to establish the children on a firm footing. Accordingly, it is often delayed until after their birth, at a time when Y rebuys herself from her husband. A name bestowed at the wedding itself becomes the legal property of the recipient, but not of his ancestral family, since it cannot be passed on except to a child of X and Y. If there are no children, it is felt that the name has become practically dormant and it can be revived by a member of the donor's ancestral family. Thus it is virtually held in readiness for X's and Y's children, though literally this is not the case, since it belongs, meanwhile, to some individual. A sentiment that enters into a transaction of this kind is that, by the presentation of a name to some member of the family of the other partner, a kindly disposition is shown and confidence that it will be duly honoured by bestowal on the children of the couple. Indeed, some parents do no more than promise that

NE5 Bellacoola NE5

585 if a grandchild be born they will give him a certain name if a 553 boy, and another if a girl, so that henceforth no one can take that title for himself, even though it is not in use. As already 425 mentioned, even when a name has duly passed to one of the children, it can be recalled in future generations by a return marriage. The transmission of names, or the promising of them for children yet unborn, is perhaps the most binding feature of the whole marriage rite. Mythology contains instances in which names, and other prerogatives, have been given away outright. Cases are cited by the Bella Coola where a father has given hunting-grounds as "food" for the use of the relatives of his son- or daughter-in-law, but it is usual merely to promise the use of them to the grandchildren.

581 Since the transference of names, or other prerogatives, is 553 the foundation stone of Bella Coola marriages, it is necessary to digress still further in an attempt to analyse the concepts 578 at the base of the transaction. If the contracting parties are 425 members of different ancestral families, or even of different branches of the same family, there is a feeling of strain and unpleasantness at the intimate relations into which they are brought. There is a conflict of desires. On one hand is the wish to keep the family prerogatives from going afield; on the other, a wish that they should go afield to show the respect felt for the bride or bridegroom. If children result, the matter is simple, since they are equally members of the ancestral families of mother and father and form a bond which draws the two social units into the closest community of interest. Return marriages will then be sought by successive generations, until the prerogatives of the two families become so closely interwoven that a child will, indeed, be born into the ranks of related ancestors from both parents. But when there are no children the matter is complicated, since the recipients of names not uncommonly try to keep them unjustly. They may do so with the best intentions, feeling that it would be a slight to the donors to give them back. Bella Coola etiquette is not sufficiently exact to stipulate what should be done. If the name is not returned, the donors may be offended at its being kept; if it is returned, they may be offended that it has not been kept.

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

The following examples will help to explain this rather complex point.

About 1900 the sister of a man who was middle-aged in 1922 was married to a Bella Coola to whom she was not related. At the wedding, her father being dead, her brother expounded one of the family's origin myths, and she took her husband a name from it. It was said to have been "hauled across," the word used being the same as that signifying the dragging of a heavy timber, suggesting, of course, the importance and dignity of the designation in question. On two later occasions the woman's family gave valuable presents to the man's, thus doing their part to cement the pulya, the strength which comes to both families by an interchange of presents marking the dignity of marriage, in fact, its basic principle. Unfortunately, there were no children. If the husband had wished to retain these names for his family, he should have arranged a further marriage between one of his own relatives and one of his wife's, to return the value of gifts he had received. He did not do so, and thus lost all legal claim to the designations in question. None the less, he was indignant when his wife's brother duly validated one of these names for himself at a potlatch, as if it had been dormant.

The accompanying diagram-pedigree shows another instance of the same kind. Iwanus's daughter, Iwalkinis, was married to Niniwamlais, and at the wedding her father promised his name for any offspring. No children were born, but Niniwamlais illegally used the designation, Iwanus, for King George, his son by another wife. This naturally incensed the relatives of the first Iwanus, especially as the debt could not be adjusted by the marriage of one of Niniwamlais's daughters to one of their family, since there were no daughters. To make matters worse, King George passed the name to his son, Jack King George, and again there were no daughters to readjust the debt. Finally, Jack King George married Spakal, a relative of the first Iwanus, without the usual lengthy period of engagement, and while she was still concealed for the year that follows puberty. No children resulted, by which part of the debt could have been repaid. Thus, not only did Jack King George violate the customary ideas of decency, but in the course of three generations two women were obtained from the Iwanus family without any recompense. Bitter feelings arose, and a few years ago one of the descendants of the first Iwanus took the name for himself at a potlatch as if it had been dormant, thus arousing the ire of Jack King George. In 1913

581 two of his female relatives were murdered at Kimsquit. The slayer was 553 never detected, but most of the Bella Coola believe that it was done by 571 one of Smaoan's relatives, and that the dispute about names was quite 425 sufficient to furnish an excuse for the deed.

It is hoped that these two instances will serve to emphasize why the [682] Bella Coola prefer marriages within the ranks of the ancestral family. When this takes place, names are usually given outright, and not merely promised for the use of the future children.

585 After this digression, to return to the marriage of X and Y: The ceremony is taking place in the house of Y's father, and the parents of each participant have expounded parts of their origin myths, and promised names for the resultant children.

Then Y's relatives give numerous presents to X's family, in each case including those who are associating themselves with the contract. Canoes, slaves, blankets, and other articles of great worth are given; they are said to be "bed covering" for Y. The greater their value, the greater her prestige. Her

"My father, my mother, my brothers, my uncles, and their associates have given me my bed covering."

These presents are the binding feature of the wedding. They are said to lock the girl in her husband's house, and

[537] Another orator now holds forth on behalf of Y's father:

old man came back to Bella Coola with his son, a man about twenty-five years of age. During his absence all his relatives had died, and he was forgotten. He went to the house of a man with whom his ancestors had intermarried generations ago, explained who he was, and was welcomed. The old man and his son have since lived there, although it is doubtful if the owner of the house had ever heard of their existence, and the son cannot even speak the Bella Coola language. 602 476

X and Y themselves are not entirely overlooked in the exchange of presents between their two families. If Y's father is well pleased with his son-in-law he may show this not only publicly, which redounds to his own credit, but by the communication of secret lore such as a special number of nights for ceremonial chastity. Conversely, if Y should not be a kusiut, her father-in-law often asks her father's permission to make her a member of that society. The woman's father is naturally pleased and makes no objections; so she is initiated, using a name and prerogative embodied in her husband's family. Commonly too, they give her one of their ancestral names at any convenient ceremony later than the wedding. In conformity with the rules already explained, if Y should die childless the names return to X's relatives, but if there are children they pass to them. It is said that susook names can never be transferred in this manner. 606 431 425 [785] [575] [553] [575]

Y's father and other relatives continue to take an interest in her ceremonial welfare and in her personal comfort. If X beats or otherwise abuses her, they expostulate; and if his cruelty becomes unbearable they shelter their daughter when she runs away from her husband. If X should murder Y, she would be revenged by her family. Only one instance of this was known, when the murderer avoided his pursuers by fleeing from the country. As a rule a wife is fairly well treated, though this depends on the character of the husband, the importance of her relatives, and the amount of goods expended to validate the marriage. Among slaves and persons of no influence, it is assumed that a husband may sell his wife as a 593 [602] [627] [567] 432 [648]

sents given by X's relatives up to the time of the wedding have exceeded in value those which they have received. Later, whenever, and as often as X gives a potlatch, Y's relatives are expected to rebuy her from her husband. Although this is the expression used by the Bella Coola, it has only a ceremonial significance, since Y remains X's wife. 556 583

Whenever X intimates that he is going to give a potlatch, Y and her relatives begin to hoard goods irrespective of whether or not children have been born. Their value is unregulated by custom, although the individuals concerned always try to give as much as they can; usually X does not know exactly how much will be provided until their actual delivery. Moreover, this is the occasion most preferred by the relatives of a wife to present to her husband ancestral names or other prerogatives embodied in origin myths. The exact rights of X with respect to such gifts have already been defined so need not be repeated here. Even if Y has taken an ancient name to her husband when she was married, she may bring him another when repurchased. This is an event of even greater importance to a woman than marriage, so no effort is spared to add to the dignity of the occasion.

On the second night of a potlatch Y's father announces what prerogatives he proposes to grant to X. These may include the right to a certain totem-pole design, the carving of a spoon, a painting for the wall of the house, or any other element embodied in the origin myth. These privileges are displayed by X at the coming potlatch. If, as is usual, Y's father wishes to give his son-in-law an ancestral name, it is announced on this occasion, and is the designation by which X is known during the ceremony. It is always said that such a name is so "heavy," in the sense of "so important" that it must be "dragged across" to her husband by Y. Kusiut names are commonly transferred as presents, but without any public bestowal, and one or two instances are known of the similar acquisition of susak prerogatives and whistles; it was in this way that Potlas was able to import susak ritual from Bella Bella. After announcing the 425 556 583 [553]

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

(5) They govern Y's status in this world. When women quarrel, as they often do, the most common boast to shame a less wealthy rival is a reminder of the number of times the speaker was repurchased and the value of the goods used. 556 583 [578]

"I can sit down on fifteen canoes," or "I am carried by five slaves," says the angry woman, mentioning whatever goods were used for her repurchase.

(6) Finally, these goods serve a more definite purpose in obtaining for Y a name, or names, of which the value is directly proportionate to the expenditure, precisely as the importance of a chief's designation depends on the goods used to validate it. [553]

As with men's names, some women's appellations were given by Ālqustäm to the first arrivals; others were created on this earth with regard to peculiar events, and still others are names which can be used either by men or women. Theoretically, the dignity of the first type of name is greater than either of the others, but in practice the importance of the owner depends on the number of times she has bought herself from her husband; the principles governing the rank of women are thus the same as those already described for men. The term yutsak, applied to a woman who has many times rebought herself and so reached a position of eminence, is the feminine equivalent to stäkmy. The creation of women's names in reference to personal characteristics or incidents connected with their married life is more common than similar creations for men. The ritual of the bestowal of a name on Y, here given, was omitted from the description of the potlatch in order to lessen the complexity of that ceremony. It will be remembered that on the afternoon of the second day of the potlatch Y's relatives appear outside X's house, carrying valuable presents. 551 556 583 [554] [562] 553 556 583

The announcer calls out that Y's father has come to give "food" to X and his relatives. By food, presents are meant, which are the return, with interest, of the gifts given by X's relatives on various occasions. The giver is announced, for other relatives than Y's father contribute, and to whom the

1:McIlwraith B-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

553 556 583 present is made. The recipient may either be X himself or one of his relatives who has conferred a gift on one of Y's family. The goods are taken inside, counted, displayed, and the same announcement made. These presents are given away by X the same evening, so that the only practical advantage that he receives is that the ultimate recipients make their returns, if any, to him. He makes no recompense to Y's relatives for these.

"Please, ye people, listen to my words. This is an important occasion, hearken to what I have to say. Long ago our first ancestors were married, as X and Y have been, and it is fitting that we should make the name ..... live again in Y. Three years [or as long as the name has been dormant] it has been dead, as if living with the ghosts beneath the earth. Now it shall stand up again in Y; henceforth we use it for her. Come forth ..... [using Y's new name], your father rebuys you from X for fifty blankets [for example]."

Y may be anywhere; the statement "come forth" is merely symbolical. The fifty blankets are piled outside the house and the spectators, of whom many have gathered to witness the transaction, know that that number of blankets has been given with reference to that name. In some cases the wife is rebought three, four, or even more times for one name, either repeatedly by her father, or successively by her father and other relatives, or several names may be acquired by the different repurchasings. For instance, at one potlatch not many years ago a woman obtained the names Łałłkt, Xwulbw, Smaiw-a, and Ailtamka. As with men, some women prefer to have one very strong name, rather than diffuse their importance over a number. In this particular case the four designations were received from different relatives. At each repurchase the call is raised:

"Come forth ..... your brother [uncle, or whatever relative it may be] rebuys you from X for ....."

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

In one case where an orphan woman, without relatives, repurchased herself by her own arduous labours, the announcement was made: 553 556 583

"Y's belt has come to rebuy her."

The reference was to the manner in which she had looped up her clothing with a belt when working. If Y's father should die after amassing goods to repurchase her, they are used for the purpose intended and the announcement is:

"Y's father's anus has come to rebuy her."

The ancestral family descended from the first settlers at Swalle tl have the prerogative of singing a special song as they rebuy one of their daughters. This was used by their first ancestors on a like occasion. The theme is: [424] [533]

"I, I, I am the highest of you all. No one of you is capable of doing what I can accomplish. You all live on what I void."

The significance of this last sentence is that the village of Swalle tl is farthest up the Bella Coola River. Its inhabitants used to claim that the people of the other villages lived on the refuse which they threw into the river, a source of pride to them. [186]

After announcing the various relatives who have rebought Y, the presents are counted and carried into X's house. The statement concerning their number, who has given them, and for what purpose, is repeated to the foreign guests there assembled, and they are then piled indiscriminately in a large heap for future distribution. At this juncture X calls out:

"Come in, come in," as though he were welcoming arrivals from a distance.

Y's relatives enter, and the ritual of the potlatch continues in the manner already described. The origin myth in which Y's new name is embodied is related in considerable detail, especially its recent history, that is, by whom it was last used and any pertinent items connected with its transmission. If she has received several names from different myths, each is similarly expounded.

As has been said, many women's names have been created 551 553

1: McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

551 with respect to their appearance or actions on this earth. As far as could be learnt, the procedure of bestowal is identical with [553] that just described. The following examples illustrate designations of this type:

Ȧnäbsullänämlaix, "The Resident Maker." In the begin-[773] ning of time the wife of Ṫaiakwala had twins so often that the village rapidly increased in population. Accordingly she took this name for herself when she rebought herself from her husband. It was transmitted for generations in the ancestral family of Ṫaiakwala's descendants until lent about one hundred years ago. The recipients claimed it as their own and passed it to a certain Omqomkilska, recently deceased, who gave it to her brother's daughter at the time of her marriage. Since this woman's husband has not yet given a potlatch the name is accordingly in a degraded condition at the present time (1923).

551 Olliyaiyɔ, "I Am the Worthless One." The mother-in-law
578 of this woman had been in the habit of insulting her daughter-606 in-law by saying, even when strangers were present:

"We have a worthless daughter-in-law."

On rebuying herself the woman advertised the rudeness of her husband's mother by throwing her words back in her teeth.

Nulalulaks, "I Am the One Whose Eyes Are Hungry." The mother-in-law of this woman used to eat without offering food to her son's wife.

Nukokwixodjäx, "The One Whose Haunches Are Dusty." Her mother-in-law did not give her a place to sit in the house so that she was forced to stay close to the fire in the ashes.

Kwiläxlaix, "The One Who Sits Where There Is No Space." Her mother-in-law objected to this woman sitting near her husband when he took his ceremonial seat, and insulted her with the above remark.

551 Nunuaox'as, "The Stingy One." It was said that this 578 woman restrained her husband's generosity until he gained an unpleasant reputation for parsimony. She publicly shamed

l:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

her husband's critics by taking this name for herself when she rebought herself from him. 551 578

Nu'aos, "The Inhospitable One." Her husband received this reputation owing to his wife's manners, so she advertised what had been said about him.

Nuplätlsikän, "Heedlessly Deaf." This woman's mother-in-law claimed that she deliberately failed to hear what she was told to do, and applied the above epithet to her. The daughter-in-law confounded her by taking it as her own name. [606]

When a name of this type is assumed it is always announced when, where, and for what purpose it was first created. 553

A description has already been given of the actual ritual by which X bestows the goods acquired from the repurchase of Y, but it is necessary to enlarge on the prohibition against their use for the direct benefit of one of the children of the couple. The theory is that the goods bind the marriage contract and express in a practical and lofty form the kindly sentiments with which Y's relatives regard her husband, and the bond between the two families, hence they must be used solely for the benefit of him and his relatives. A man usually applies these goods to initiate the children of his brothers or sisters into the ranks of the ssaok or kusiut. It is unthinkable for goods to be delivered without an exposition of Y's family's glories, but if this should ever take place, there would be no difficulty in applying them to the direct benefit of her children. When used, for example, to make a child of X's brother a ssaok, he is a living testimony of the noble way in which Y's relatives have done that which is fitting for the family of her husband. Due to accidents in announcing and storing of presents, it sometimes happens that those obtained by the repurchasing of Y are used for the benefit of her own children. Unless this error is corrected, the child could always be shamed by having it said: 556 583 [558]

"You are a mere nobody. The goods expended in the

556 repurchase of your mother have become nothing beneath your 583 feet."

When such an accident occurs, the relatives of X take some [558] future occasion to give presents to validate his child, with the announcement:

"The goods used from the repurchase of his mother have become nothing beneath his feet. We hereby supply that deficiency."

Thus it is demonstrated that the relatives of both parents are interested in his welfare, so that his path is clear before him.

553 Many women are only repurchased once, but an effort is 556 made to do this frequently since the more times, the greater 583 her prestige. After several repurchasings it is felt that the names and other prerogatives "dragged across" by Y have become valueless. But since new names have been taken to her husband on each occasion, the marks of friendship between the two families are still plain. Then it is that those first transmitted can be revived by relatives of Y, unless, of course, X has validated them for his children. If there is only one repurchasing, the names remain the definite property of X. This is not a clearly formulated law, merely a sentiment that the earlier names have been covered by those later given, and that accordingly Y's relatives, having done what was proper, can now use the titles once more. There is a constant interchange of names and privileges between families related by marriage.

556 It is virtually impossible to over-estimate the importance
583 of this rite of repurchase among the Bella Coola, one of the [182] few customs preserved tenaciously amid the ruins of their ancient culture. The writer was forcibly struck with the following instance which occurred while he was in Bella Coola:

About fifteen years before, a young man and woman had married with due formality. After three children had been [586] born, the mother took to drink and vice until her husband at last repudiated her, retaining possession of the children. The woman, weakened by disease, divorced by her husband, and composed the tunes used; to the carpenter who had prepared and used the masked figure; to the members of the band, including a payment for their services whenever Dan Nelson's child should die; to a carpenter to erect a fence around the grave; to another to cut the representation of an eagle on a stone to be erected over the grave; to the speakers at the funeral; to the speakers at the rite then taking place; to those who delivered the money; to the youth who, with pencil and paper, assisted in keeping accounts; to the cook, and to all others who had assisted in any manner. In every case the amount was announced, the bill held up, the name of the recipient stated, the reason for his reward, and the money was then taken to him by a messenger. Captain Schooner really decided how much each should receive, he being in the best position to judge what was suitable, and there being no fixed scale of charges to help him. Work paid for in advance, such as the erection of the fence, was carefully carried out.

A little money had been kept to validate the assumption of ancestral names by several children of the Schooner family. Everyone received a small amount, a child sometimes as trifling a sum as 25 cents. Captain Schooner had virtually chosen who was to receive which designation, although he received advice from all his relatives. Harry Schooner's infant was given the name, Pätcätcus, a reference to the manner in which the first beams of the morning sun strike the lofty summit of Mount Nusqalst. Reuben's son was called ellmäls, a Snulle-tl designation connected with the crash when the first Sonq' fell. The myths in which these names were embodied were not expounded; in fact, they had been almost forgotten, even by Captain Schooner. Täl-io Jenny wished to transmit one of her names to Andy Schooner's infant; this was announced in the same way as the others and validated with them by the gifts to all. Jenny had not contributed to the common stock, but some of it was used with the understanding that she would later repay. Nebuchadnezzar announced the

769 sum being used for each name, and the bills were displayed *556 before messengers carried them to the recipients.

Finally, Jim Pollard took the opportunity to bestow on 553 Captain Schooner the name, Swaulhals. This designation 425 was the property of the donor's ancestral family and should [614] not have been transmitted without the consent of all its mem-[622] bers. Jim had probably informed several of them of his intention, but no objections would have been raised if he had overlooked this courtesy, since he is the only wamitl chief among them, and the only one with determination and prestige. It was not an outright gift, since it was announced that it must be returned to the donor's family on Captain Schooner's death. Jim Pollard acted as his own announcer for this transaction, explaining that he gave the name in gratitude for the help which Captain Schooner had rendered at the death of his, Jim's, father about twenty years before. He promised that at the earliest opportunity he would give presents to validate the transmission.

769 During the lengthy distribution of money, the audience had
*556 shown unmistakable signs of weariness. It was now between 2.00 and 3.00 A.M., and as soon as Jim had finished speaking the guests dispersed quietly, though many of them gathered in groups in one another's houses to discuss what had taken place.

Captain Schooner slept late after the lengthy ceremony, but was proud and contented when interviewed about noon. He felt that what was fitting for his daughter had been performed, and was willing to take the consequences of having broken the law.

968 Little else of note occurred in connection with Jessie's funeral. Samuel King deposited near her grave a sewing-machine which his wife had used for only a short time and Captain Schooner decided to replace this with an older one belonging to his wife. He made this exchange on the afternoon of June 30, when Samuel, in company with a number of women, was burning the rest of Jessie's clothing and possessions. Captain Schooner explained his act by saying:

"I am Ánolxmdimut," she said. "Everyone calls on me to visit the sick, and henceforth they will likewise seek you and your basin." 756* 787*

Something entered his stomach, causing it to heave violently, and he felt that the sickness had left him. He sent for the singers and repeated to them the words that Ťłitcäplilän·a had chanted; these formed the text of the shaman's song which he used on future occasions. While giving them to the singers, he endeavoured to dance, but was too feeble to do more than weakly shake his hands. From that time on, Ánolxmdimut was able to cure the sick.

This last account is typical. Ťłitcäplilän·a appears, inserts something into the body of the patient to cure him, sings one or more songs, gives the sufferer a name, and then vanishes. [553] The curing power thus bestowed remains within the person benefited; it is this that enables him to heal others if Ťłitcäplilän·a has so decided. In such cases, there is mention of a "basin" in the song, and the one who has just recovered will be able to treat others, especially those suffering from the same [755] malady as himself. The reference to a basin is because such utensils are used during treatments. To the Bella Coola a shaman is one who has had such an experience and has publicly claimed it, whether or not he can cure the sick.

Ťłitcäplilän·a is known by many names, in accordance with [776] her ability to treat many diseases, and the designation she bestows depends upon the malady cured. The following are [553] some of the names received from her by shamans.

Sexsexqwalxlaoslaix, "The Strengthener of the Breath." [551] This name was given to a person who was cured when he found breathing very difficult. The text of his song was:

"Ťłitcäplilän·a gave me (the name) Sexsexqwalxlaoslaix [533] with a small object to aid the breathing of the very sick."

Tämtämslo·psta. This has the same significance as the last.

Nexnäx·mälosaix, "The Dancer Near the Fire." [551]

Ánolxmdimut, "The Dancer Who Makes Noise Only with

Ninitsamlaix, "The Restorer." He is able to cure the sick even when at the point of death. 756*

Ānuskieknm, "The Saviour." He can rescue persons who have been injured by other supernatural beings. 776 787*

Nunutsnumikmem, "The One Who is Thought Of." Having powerful curing abilities, people think of him when ill.

Ānotābākmots, "The Open-Mouthed One." His mouth is always open to suck forth sickness.

Nustkākstāmidjut, "He Whose Basin Is in His Own Body." A person who receives the ability to cure from this being does not use the customary basin.

Sisiutl. It is said that many Rivers Inlet shamans have received their powers from this creature, which is accordingly well known to the Bella Coola in this connection, although few of their own people are said to have been benefited by it. 756* 787*

Since all animals are supernatural, it follows that any of them can cure the sick. Instances are remembered of this, in which the patient received a name differing slightly from that of his animal benefactor. Salmon, especially cohoes and early spring salmon, are extremely potent curers and many sick people have received aid from them. It is recognized that the former are uncanny since they have the ability to hide themselves in insignificant streams. One man was cured by a tree which gave him a yodel-like shaman's song, imitating the creaking and waving of its branches. More often, however, a supernatural animal merely speaks to a man without making him a shaman. [825] [533]

Two courses are open to the patient who has been cured by such a visitation. He may at once proclaim his powers, or he may say nothing about them in the hope of obtaining further revelations and further names. From a single experience he has received a certain amount of power, but the more he has, the greater this will be. If he decides not to wait, he at once calls the singers and repeats to them the words and tunes of the songs he has received. When later on he gives presents to validate his shamanistic name, it becomes publicly recognized [553] [554]

* 756 that he is a shaman, and his future status depends on his
* 787 success in curing those who appeal to him. If the man decides [553] not to make use of his experience, he must not mention the [556] name of his apparition, as to do so would not only prevent further benefits, but would cause the return of the disease from which he had been suffering. Some shamans have waited until they have received three or four separate visitations, acquiring a name at each; and a Bella Bella man was known to have had ten. Whether or not it is wise at once to display shaman's power is a matter on which there is no general agreement. On the one hand by long, and perhaps fruitless, waiting, a man postpones the social esteem which would have been his if he had at once displayed his prowess, gambling with his chances of receiving still greater gifts. While awaiting further visitations, a man may be able to make use of the power already received, although he cannot do so formally as an accredited shaman. Thus one man, who long ago was visited by a supernatural being, but has made no public claim of his apparition, [955] is able to cure stomach-ache among his own grandchildren by massaging the stomach as if to force something from it, and then puffing this something, four times, from his spread hands. Still hoping for power, he declined to say by which supernatural being he had been visited.

The following account was obtained from one of the few old Bella Coola who claim to have had shamanistic experiences. It describes what is done when the patient decides not to wait for further revelations:

When comparatively young, the informant slept one night in the forest with a companion. On awakening the following morning, they found a trail of dried blood leading to their blankets. They examined themselves and found no wound, so concluded that the blood could not be their own, and, therefore, was a mystery, over which they worried for a few days but then forgot. About a week later, the narrator of the incident dreamed that a strange creature came to him; he did not know what it was, but it terrified him. A few minutes later

* 756 and heard her utter the name that was to be his, as a shaman,
* 787 Nitsumdimul. He began to shake his hands as if dancing, for he was too feeble to do more, and began to sing the song. His mother at once called in the singers who listened, learning it for future use. The man is firmly convinced that if his mother had not thus called in the singers so speedily he would, after four days, have received another vision, and with it real shamanistic power. As it is, he is a shaman, since he was cured when at the point of death by Thitäplilin-a and received a name and song from her, but he is unable himself to effect cures. As soon as the singers had departed, his mother at once began to make for him a collar formed of alternate bands of dyed, and
[552] [554] family distributed presents, thus validating his shamanistic name. Such presents are not returnable; "they have become nothing" for the designation. Thus accredited, a shaman is in a position to start curing, if his song has contained a reference to a basin, otherwise, as in the present case, he is merely a shaman in a social sense, not professionally. There is thought to be actually within the new shaman's body, some peculiar
[841] warning to menstruating women and others who are unclean to remain at a distance, and he spends much of his time alone in the forest. This continues until the next kusiut dance season when the coming to him of a you (II, p. 6) frees him from restraint, since the one supernatural power drives out the other. If the shaman himself is unwilling to have a you, it is sufficient if one comes to a son, or other near relative.

A shaman who has been told by his supernatural visitor to use a basin instructs a carpenter to make one for him. The design depends either on the owner's wish, or on that of his benefactor if the latter has decreed specifically.

type of dance differs from all other Bella Coola ones, since no inherited prerogative is required. Years ago such exhibitions were common, although curing shamans were rare. 756* 556

The usual time for a shaman's performance is at the conclusion of the kuxiut season, though one is sometimes held prior to that period if the would-be performer fears that the food which he has stored up for the event is likely to be frozen. [796]

When he decides to give a dance, the shaman first summons the singers to his house and teaches them a song of his own composition. Theoretically both text and tune should have been received from his supernatural benefactor, but many performers undoubtedly employ songs used by shaman ancestors which they have chanced to remember. Another device is to describe a supernatural being seen in a dream. In some cases there is deliberate deception, but in most the performer persuades himself that he has received supernatural authorization. The texts are full of obscure allusions, a river, for example, is spoken of as swift running water. Often a man will treasure a song for years, before collecting the wealth necessary to use it publicly, with the social prestige attached. A shaman always obtains a name from his supernatural benefactor, but if a man merely uses a feat observed in a dream, this is impossible, so he adopts the designation of some deceased shaman, soon convincing himself that it was uttered by the apparition. Others will probably remember this name, hence suspicions may easily be aroused concerning the authenticity of the performance, but it is not customary to voice these. The singers repeat the song which they have just heard, and continue doing so until they have mastered it. Sometimes they compose further songs themselves for the performer. During the practising, those who are not kuxiut are expelled from the house. A shaman is a person who has come in contact with the supernatural; hence he is akin to the members of the society who, therefore, support him during his rite.* A herald is sent out

*Theoretically, a shaman need not be a kuxiut, but visitations usually come only to those of religious and imaginative temperaments, who are in the majority of cases already members of the society.

* 787 843 If a woman dreams that she has caught two salmon, two small birds, or is holding two infants, the birth of twins is foretold. This type of explanation is obvious; in fact, these examples lie on the border-line between direct and symbolic interpretations.

* 787 843 775 Another indication of approaching pregnancy is for a woman to dream of a dead relative; this means that the latter will soon be re-born. An elderly Kimsquit man mentioned that some fifty years earlier his mother dreamt that her dead mother came to her, saying that she was lonesome and wished to return. Soon afterwards she conceived, and the daughter born was considered to be the reincarnation of her own grandmother whose names she was promptly given. At the present time, this informant addresses his sister as sister, though he states that as a child he was taught to call her grandmother. As already mentioned, if a new-born infant is a reincarnation, the fact can often be recognized by holes or dimples in the ears, relics of previous borings for rings. Unless such a birth has been foretold in a dream, it is impossible to learn whom the child re-embodies. [553]

* 787 [761] A dream of frequent occurrence in Bella Coola is the return of the sleeper to the scenes and activities of his childhood. This always signifies a long life. Strangely enough, to dream of being nailed in one's coffin and carried to the grave is translated conversely, and likewise indicates a long life. It is remembered that there were many dreams of fire before the outbreak of the smallpox epidemic, so it has since been assumed that such presage an outbreak of this disease. [731]

* 787 224 [785] The only dreams of which the interpretations are wholly symbolic are those experienced by hunters. The Bella Coola explain this by saying that hunters always observe ceremonial chastity and their spirits are, therefore, in a receptive condition to supernatural impressions. When a man has set his traps, he is able to tell from his dreams whether or not any animals have been caught:

To dream that a canoe has been upset in the river and that

*575 Ano'likwolxaix. They may be termed marshals of the society. [424] Each must have an ancestral prerogative for this, duly vali- [776] dated by presents to the kukuxiut, in addition to a kuxiut prerogative of some kind. In each village there are four or five of these men. Whenever food is being served at a kuxiut dance, the marshals receive theirs first and then one or other of them addresses the audience in slow and impressive style, beating on the floor with a stick to add emphasis to his words. He admonishes his fellows to safeguard the ancient rites of the society, to be bold, to be secretive, and he pays honour to the member who has given the dance. It is they who take the leading part if a youth is dragged away to the meeting-place for initiation, and it is they who arrange matters when a spy reports that a non-member is over-inquisitive. If any member of the society *575 should break one of its laws at a time when no uninitiated are 688 present, the marshal is expected to seize a burning stick from the fire and strike the offender with it. If death should result, revenge is unthinkable, since the criminal had broken the law. The same fate is unhesitatingly meted out to any kuxiut who should dare to betray any of the mysteries to the uninitiated. Moreover, it is the marshals who decide whether any improper act lowers the dignity of a dance, and punish accordingly. Not many years ago a kuxiut woman gave birth to a child while a dance was taking place and the infant was slain by one of the marshals. The usual explanation made to the uninitiated for [961] a death within the dance-house is that a supernatural being caused the roof to fall and kill the victim.

*575 Each marshal has, in connection with his prerogative of 551 this vocation, a professional name, used only within the house where a kuxiut dance is taking place and carefully concealed [424] from the uninitiated. Some designations were obtained from Ano'likwolxaix by an ancestor of the possessor, others were created on this earth with reference to some specific event, and [553] duly made valid by presents to the kukuxiut alone. Some of these names are:

Xwulxlmis, "The Destroyer," so given on account of an

*575 only by members of the same tribe. The Bella Coola firmly 648 believe that if, for example, there is a serious disaster at 688 Xemqo-ti, that village will be raided by the people of Bella 721 Bella, Fort Rupert, Kitkatla, or by tribes even farther away.
[628] News of the accident reaches Tāl-io or Kimsquit and the inhabitants, themselves related by blood to the offenders and therefore unwilling to punish them, call upon the members of a foreign tribe to do so. On different occasions this statement, in practically identical terms, was made by six independent informants, so there appears to be not the slightest doubt as to the belief of the people in this law. But when specific cases were asked for, they could not be obtained. It therefore appears clear that the Bella Coola, probably owing to long teaching on the part of the kukusiut, consider that an error in ritual is sufficient to bring punishment from an alien tribe. There must be some basis of truth in this conviction, and it is highly probable that the kukusiut must have taken advantage of raids to explain to the uninitiated that these were caused by disasters in ritual. One informant was of the opinion that, following the collapse of a house at Kimsquit during a Canpibal dance, a Bella Coola chief called upon Tokise, chief of the Kitkatla, who raided Kimsquit in punishment. Quite apart from the belief inculcated in the uninitiated, it is obvious that tribes eager for war sometimes used an accident as pretext. The Bella Coola know of no case in which they raided a foreign tribe for this reason, although they state that if they had been called upon to act as punisher, they could not have refused.

*575 Leaving now the functions of the society as a whole, the 424 rights of an individual member can next be described. Each 425 kusiut has:

553 (1) A Kusiut Name. Like every other prerogative, a name of this type can be acquired from father, uncle, grandfather, or other relative, or even by a son from his mother. As a rule a kusiut wills his designation or designations, for a man may [556] have several, before death and his wishes are observed. Although the cost of validating such a prerogative is less than a potlatch, yet a Cannibal dance, for example, entails considerable expenditure, so a man entitled to give such a ceremony frequently lends his right to another, or it may lie dormant for generations. Like other loaned prerogatives, failure to return is a frequent cause of feud. A man frequently gives away a kusiut name-prerogative, and if he should give away all of them, he becomes legally an uninitiated. In such a case it is customary for his wife, or some relative, to give him a new kusiut prerogative, as is likewise the case when a master causes a slave to be initiated. A name is sometimes given to a person who resembles a deceased relative of the donor.

(2) A Patron, omätuts. Little need be said on this point. The words of the songs used by the dancer often describe his patron, always couched in mystical terms for the benefit of the uninitiated. If the supernatural associate performs any type of dance at the gathering above, so can his protégé perform on this earth, otherwise his power is limited to singing of the being. If an individual inherits prerogatives with the same patron from two different relatives, he can merge these to give a composite dance, with consequent additional power. Greedy individuals sometimes illegally add features to which they are not entitled, a cause of bitter feelings. Or one individual may own several prerogatives with different patrons. Although most kukusiut have only one, yet two or three are not uncommon and one case is known of a man with six distinct patrons. The uninitiated believe that from any one of these may come the call giving him the power to perform.

575* 424 776 [533] [535] [578]

(3) A Repository. In this subterranean shelter his name remains, guarded by Äns'likwolsaix. An individual with several prerogatives has a repository for each.

575* 424 778

Although the kukusiut are aware that much of their ritual is deception, it is clear that they believe in the supernatural origin of their rites, and that their ancestors actually had the abilities which their descendants of today imitate. In time

*575 some ashes which he puts into his mouth and chews. Of course 791 he masticates only the ashes but X, unaware of this, is con-796 cerned for the fate of his spirit. At last it is restored to him [794] and he is told that the siki has altered it from that of an [781] uninitiated person to that of a kusiut.[11] The psychological effect of this act on the mind of a young man who has not had time to adjust himself to his new knowledge and who is firmly convinced of the powers of the siki is tremendous.

The first siki now instructs two kukusiut sitting on either side of X to lie down to serve as a seat for him. They do so, irrespective of who they may be. If the novice is still ignorant of the full mysteries of the society, the siki announces that he is going to get a call for X. He walks around the house, peering here and there as if seeking something, and then pounces as if he had caught an object between his hands. A whistle [534] is heard, such as the novice knows accompanies the coming of every call; but he does not know that the noise is made by compressing a goat or bear bladder-whistle between two sticks held beneath the armpit. This is the "mystery" of the strange noises.

*575 "Do you know what makes that noise?" ask the two kuku-

If X denies all knowledge, the mystery is explained to him, [688] and he is warned that he will be killed if he communicates the information to uninitiated persons. If he answers that he knows the cause, he is asked who has told him. Perhaps some lad has been peeking and has told X of what he has seen; in that case the over-inquisitive youth is at once initiated to prevent further leakage of information. As soon as X has learnt the great secret he moves to one side and the singers take their positions behind the fire. His father, or whoever it
[425] may be from whom he is to obtain his name, then stands up
[553] and unfolds its origin, telling which supernatural being is his patron, and the locality of his repository. X sometimes re-

X sometimes receives two prerogatives at his initiation, one from each parent, or from some other interested relative. In this case both are expounded. The singers listen intently, knowing that they will later be called upon to compose songs on the theme, or themes. According to some informants they immediately sing one, as if they had just created it, though it was really prepared in advance. The kukusiut listen until they have mastered it. 575* 796 [425] [553] [533]

Helpers now distribute the food provided by X's father, or whoever is responsible for his initiation. At every kusiut ceremonial the marshals are the first recipients, then the singers, and finally the others without distinction. As the guests are eating, X's father gives presents to all, without deference to rank. An announcer calls out: 575* 796 556 [264]

"Here are [for example] ten bear-skins from X's mother. They are to obtain for him his cedar-bark bracelets."

These goods are then distributed. Similarly other gifts from various relatives are handed out for his anklets, his blanket, his collar, his head-dress, and all other parts of his clothing. As each item of his ceremonial costume is validated, X dons the prepared article. A novice's head-dress consists of a round roll of dyed cedar-bark, covering a grass frame; in Stuix and the other villages of the upper valley this is decorated with a tuft of swan's down. The kukusiut of these villages also wear a distinctive decoration consisting of a swan's skin with the feathers attached. In recent years it has been customary to pile all the goods together and distribute them as ālq·ił, which has the significance of "something that has vanished for the novice's dyed cedar-bark." Theoretically, the aim of the donor is to bestow his presents on all equally, but if he finds that he has some remaining, he gives these to the chiefs, or to the relatives of someone whom he expects will soon be a novice. None of the goods used in general distributions are returnable, but a chief who receives an extra gift at the end usually remembers from whom it was received and cancels his indebtedness at the earliest opportunity. There is no close connection between the disbursements and the worth of the [425] [292] [184] [237]

Has too much	looted	Mastałos(c)	further,	he has taken with her

tsukwałhastumał	dämnałtcaiya'a
my child, Tcłkwałkis(d),	he has taken with her(e).

[103]

[WORDLESS CHORUS]

B Sänałłałdimut	nowasłłhammtsałs	ikat-ähänutsaixts
Be brave,	mothers(f),	when I speak of your ugliness(g);

ałsłłjłłtłłwamap	wanusłwałsłłtahmgałs
you have had much trouble,	your breasts have become long and pendant.

[WORDLESS CHORUS]

C The third part of this song has been forgotten.

(a) This word means "The one (feminine) with the very hairy pudenda." The woman in question had run away from her husband and the nickname was conferred at this shaming łłaiyałam rite. [551] [553]

[4]Two examples of such wordless songs were collected. They are song VII D 2a, National Museum of Canada; singer, Jim Pollard, and song VII D 3a, National Museum of Canada; singer, Lame Charlie.

844 fessional midwives. The child is washed in warm water. For ten days the mother must remain in this hut. Father and mother must not go [846] near the room for a year (according to Nusk'slu'sta, for ten days), else [825] the salmon would take offence.

553 The child is soon given its first name. On this occasion the whole tribe is invited to a feast, the name is made public, and the guests receive [852] small presents. The child retains this name until it becomes a member of the Kū'siūt, when it is given its Kū'siūt name. This ceremony takes [556] place after puberty has been reached. About this period the young man gives his first potlatch and assumes the Qē'mtsioa name.

881 When a girl reaches puberty she must stay in the shed which serves as her bedroom, where she has a separate fireplace. She is not allowed to descend to the main part of the house, and must not sit by the fire of the family. For four days she must remain motionless in a sitting posture. She fasts during the daytime, but is allowed a little food and drink at a very early hour in the morning. After this term she may leave her room, but only through a separate opening. She must not yet [292] come to the main room. When leaving the house she wears a large hat, [821] which protects her face against the rays of the sun. It is believed that if the sun should shine on her face her eyes would suffer. She may pick berries on the hills, but must not come near the river or sea for a whole year. She must not eat fresh salmon, else she would lose [262] her senses, or her mouth would be transformed into a long beak. She [261] must not chew gum or eat snow (see Fifth Report of Committee, 1889, p. 838).

584 If a young man wishes to marry a girl he goes, surrounded by his friends, to the house of the girl's father and states his intention. His [431] friends carry food and presents, and if the father accepts the suit he sends out a young man, who receives the food and presents and carries them into the house. Sometimes the father does not accept the offer at once. In such cases the young man may repeat the same ceremony until he is finally rejected or accepted. After the time of the marriage has [527] been agreed upon between the contracting parties, and the day preceding the marriage has arrived, the young man invites all the people to a feast, during which he states that he is to be married on the following day. He asks a number of men, generally from twenty to thirty, and four [302] women to assist him. On the following forenoon they assemble, and accompany the bridegroom to the girl's house. They sing outside, and 585 four of the men dance. All of them have their faces painted red. Finally they enter, and the bridegroom gives a large amount of property to the girl's father. Then the girl leaves her parents and goes to the bridegroom, bringing him also a large amount of property which has been [431] given to her for this purpose by her parents and relatives. He in turn gives her blankets and other apparel of the best quality, and distributes presents among her relatives. This is repeated after some time. All he has given to his bride and her relatives is repaid to him with interest. A rich girl will repay twice or three times the amount given by the man. At the time of the marriage the bride's father may promise the groom to give him his Sisan'kH secrets as soon as the pair have their first child. [851] The children may belong to the father's or mother's gens, as the parents may choose.

586 In case of a separation the wife refunds the amount of purchase-money. The children may stay with either parent, or part of them may

128 from Snuhli. My informant's grandchildren regard them-
173 selves as Snuhli boys, and their names are embodied in myths
361 of that village, although their forbears have not lived there
166 for five generations. There is no reason to suppose this case exceptional. Other instances were obtained of movements of people from one village to another at earlier times, and there seems no cause to doubt the general accuracy of these. Names [554] embodied in the origin myths of different towns are used as prerogatives and have been potent factors in keeping their memory alive. Uncertainties and inaccuracies there must be in the foregoing list, but on the whole it appears to be fairly reliable, since few contradictions were received from different informants.

128 Accounts obtained of the same ceremonies from the descen-184 dants of people of different villages were found in most cases to be identical. There were a few differences in custom between [796] the people of Stuix and those of the other upper valley towns on the one hand, and the inhabitants of the lower valley on [101] the other. These will be mentioned when necessary, but on the whole the inhabitants of the Bella Coola valley can be considered as a tribal entity.

114 Boas (p. 48) gives a list of Bella Coola towns which agrees 361 fairly well with the above. Among his villages are included Pe·ɔslɔ (no. 4), Nulxuɣtskwan·e (no. 7), and Nusälsum (no. 16).[11] All the older people agreed that these are the names of streams, though settlements located on them may have been known by the same designations. Names of the five villages recorded by Boas, nos. 6, 8, 9, 19, and 24, were not known by several old men questioned on the subject.

101 The villages of the Bella Coola valley did not form a political 619 unit; each was independent. A common language was spoken throughout and the inhabitants of the different towns recog-[631] nized that their origins and customs were similar. This was [197] also recognized to be the case with regard to the people living on South Bentinck Arm, and at the head of Dean Channel.

[11] Using in each case the spelling of this monograph.

from the moon and stated that there were mountains and snow on it. It is commonly stated that the marks on the moon represent a man carrying a bucket. 821 [756]

The stars figure but slightly either in Bella Coola mythology or thought; it is not even known who made them. Two in the Great Bear constellation are called respectively Tpiksta and X̌inxinas, "Little Girls." A lone star in the same part of the sky, named A'lox, is said to be following the girls to the forest for illicit intercourse. [773]

Moon, stars, and above all the sun, were, and still are to a certain extent, used by the Bella Coola in computing the passage of time. There are no individuals with the definite prerogative of keeping count of time, but formerly wise old men used to do so.[4] Differences of opinion were the rule rather than the exception, a condition which often led to bitter disputes concerning the proper date for starting the winter ceremonials. Boas (p. 41) has recorded the Bella Coola calendar in greater detail than the present writer has been able to do. The making of calendrical observations is a lost art, and the following list of the months was all that could be learnt. It will be noted that these agree with Boas in regard to the months in the early part of the year, but not in those between the summer and winter solstices; no explanation is offered for this disparity. 805 821 [554] [578] [796] [114] [178] [114]

First moon after the summer solstice: Sikālamtak, which has the significance, "The Time for Sockeye Salmon to Ascend the River."

Second moon after the summer solstice: Si'islalitl, "The Time for Eating Dog Salmon."

Third moon after the summer solstice: Si'iswai·stl, "The Time for Eating Cohoe Salmon."

Fourth moon after the summer solstice: Siqālxam, "The Time for Gathering Fern Root," or Sidakaos di Ano'likwolsaix,

[4] A Kimsquit informant stated that there were professional calendrical experts in his home, when he was a young lad although members of the kusiut society (II, chap. 1) sometimes attended to this matter. [575] [463]

773 hanging a number of bird and animal cloaks, representing ravens, eagles, whales, grizzly bears, black bears, and a few others. Alqantăm asked each individual which of these cloaks he preferred to wear. One selected a raven, another an eagle, and so on. Each donned his choice from the wall and immediately became the bird or animal chosen. Alqantăm gave each man or woman one or more names, and some food in compressed form; then sent him down in avian or mammal form. Even the animals could travel through the air like birds, and each landed on the peak of a mountain in the Bella Coola country, took off his cloak, and reassumed human form. The discarded coverings floated back up to Nasmăt·a. A few individuals, instead of coming to earth in animal form, swarmed down posts which stretched between the worlds.

177 This myth is fervently believed by the Bella Coola. Even 773 Christian Indians, though they readily admit the biblical creation as applied to the white race, remain convinced of the manner in which their own ancestors came into being. At the present time, though most ancient beliefs are rapidly passing away, few, if any, Bella Coola doubt this account of the creation of their forefathers. Their conviction rests not only on the religious aspect of their life, but on the sociological. A man's [551] most treasured possessions are the name brought down from [424] above by his ancestor in the beginning of time, the knowledge of the form taken by that ancestor, and information about the place where he landed. A collection of myths of this kind is given in vol. I, chap. vi. Lacking knowledge of his first an-[622] cestor's form, a Bella Coola has slight chance of becoming a [554] chief; such lore is the birthright of every descendant of one of [567] these first people, and those without it are almost certain to be the offspring of slaves. The social aspects of creation myths will be described later; at this point a broad outline must suffice. Nasmăt·a, "The House of Myths," is the place in which these myths were made, and are now stored, two reasons for its importance in the eyes of the Bella Coola.

[775] Nasmăt·a is not only connected with the history of an indi-

396 one at Restoration Bay. He had reached the point where he
* 776 needed help to turn the craft over, and one day, returning to his work, he heard the sound of many voices. He tarried for a few minutes, and when he reached his canoe it had been turned over as he desired.

On that occasion the beings who assisted the canoe-maker appear to have had definite form, and certainly to have displayed physical strength, but this extreme anthropomorphizing is unusual with respect to the assistance given to carpenters. The construction of a canoe is an arduous and difficult work; the person who has made one is regarded by his fellows with re-[554] spect mixed with envy, and it is tacitly assumed that he must have received more than human assistance. Considering the number of anthropomorphic beings known to the Bella Coola, it is not surprising that some individuals should assume that the successful carpenter must have had assistance from one of them, but to other Bella Coola the explanation would be in the intangible help vouchsafed to him by some kind of supernatural power.

* 776 Similar intangible power is believed to be evident in a per-828 son's thoughts. If a man receive either good or evil from a comrade it is his duty and privilege to repay. He intends to do so, but only a good man can carry out the resolution. What a white man would attribute to forgetfulness, procrastination, or lassitude, the Bella Coola say is caused by the intervention of Snuqwalnkaista, who steals away his thoughts. It is doubtful whether this being is considered to have any definite form; rather he is a barrier, normally situated within the doorway of every house. The ideas of a strong man are able to surmount the obstacle, but Snuqwalnkaista abstracts those of a weakling, and directs him to matters of no importance.

372 Another intangible supernatural being is that which de-
* 776 vours firewood. The Bella Coola say that no matter how well a fire may be provided with fuel when a person sits down to a meal, it is certain to be either out, or nearly so, when he has finished eating. The natural explanation does not satisfy

THE WASH-BASIN

A third supernatural element which must be in good condition if a Bella Coola is to prosper in life, is a nusḱulusta, wash-basin. In the land above, Ālquntām has a large one filled with water which, having been constructed by himself, is replete with power. When a child is born, a small part of this receptacle, with its contents, is reserved for him; the supernatural artisans choose the actual section, but it is Ālquntām who gives them the ability to do so. A fortunate man, whose ventures are successful and to whom goods are attracted, is said to have a good wash-basin; whereas the ill-luck of an unfortunate person is attributed, among other reasons, to the small size of his supernatural vessel. The Bella Coola have no clear ideas about the connection between an individual and his wash-basin. Some state that it remains in the land above; others believe that its intangible essence comes to a child at birth and grows up with him, always near his body, as if it were the offspring of the basin in the land above. As long as it remains in motion the owner continues in good health and prosperity, but if it becomes sluggish he falls ill. Long ago, shamans knew how to reanimate a wash-basin, but since the time of the first people, when supernatural ability was common, this has been a lost art. Senile decay is attributed to listlessness of this possession.

River water, being a creation of Ālquntām, is akin to the water in his basin above. Boys are always advised to bathe in the river at dawn; the act is termed ásḱulusam, a word connected with nusḱulusta. A prayer is uttered while washing. The combination of verbal appeal and the application of water strengthens the petitioner's wash-basin and so increases his chances for prosperity. Until a few years ago, this practice was almost universal. Water is always considered a strange substance, obviously a supernatural creation, and believed to be the chief means of sustenance for a child after being weaned.[29]

[29]This may be a mere rationalization.

This endogamic principle will be described in greater detail 582 in vol. I, chap. VII, but mention of it here has been necessary [614] to explain the composition of the ancestral family.

In recent years there has been a tendency for some men to marry foreign women in order that they, or their children, might obtain new prerogatives. Thus a trend towards exogamy has arisen from the same reason which is supposed to [554] have caused endogamy. The offspring of such marriages cannot enjoy the feeling of strength and comfort that comes from the membership of both parents in the same ancestral family, but some individuals have felt that this was offset by the gain of highly desirable foreign prerogatives. It is said that this practice was initiated by a certain Potlus, father of a man about sixty years old in 1923. White influence probably [177] had nothing to do with this radical innovation, although its wide adoption has been made more easy by the establishment of peaceful conditions on the coast.

Strong as is the belief in a common ancestry, it is unlikely 614 that this would have sufficed to hold together the members of 554 the ancestral family, without some definite prerogatives. These are of two kinds: names and land.

NAMES

The fundamental principle governing Bella Coola nomen- 551 clature is that each name must have originated in connection with some event of comparative importance. It is unthinkable to apply a casual designation to a child. At a person's death [768] his name, or names, may be transmitted to a relative, and it [553] is proper that the owner of a name should know when, by whom, and for what reason, it was first created. Tradition [773] affirms that, before coming to this earth, the first people were all given designations by Alquntám; these have been carefully handed down and are still in use. One name cannot be given to two individuals; instances occur of two people having the same one, but in such cases they have different origins. One [428] person may have several names of different kinds, each carrying

The ancestral family consists of those whose ancestral names, embodying definite prerogatives, are embodied in a single origin myth. 614 424 551

A stranger finds it easier to understand why names are so carefully maintained within the ancestral family by thinking of them as symbols of prerogatives, but it must be emphasized that the Bella Coola preserve with equal jealousy those designations of which the only prerogative is the marking of this actual membership. [554]

If, then, the ancestral family be regarded as a group possessing a large number of name-prerogatives, it may well be asked how these are distributed among the members. The first point to be emphasized is that the ancestral family is a unit held together without definite social mechanism. There is no accepted "head" of the family, nor are there any clearly formulated laws governing the transmission of the name-prerogatives. Before death a man usually calls together his relatives and bequeaths,[8] according to his desire, his personal property in slaves and canoes, and his intangible property in names. Such a designation does not become the property of the new owner unless he is able to validate his ownership by a distribution of presents; meanwhile the name is "dead." If, during this period, some other member of the ancestral family should desire it for a child, or for himself, he can take possession of it by the customary distribution of presents. In doing so he would anger the legatee, but the latter cannot himself use the appellation since it is already in use. Even at the present time there are bitter quarrels over the assumption of names, and such have certainly occurred for many generations. If a man can validate fairly promptly a name willed to him, it is most unusual for anyone else to try to forestall him. 614 553 428 553 431 [578]

If a man dies intestate, his sons consider themselves his normal heirs, and the most respected of them validates for himself as many names as he desires or is able to assume. Disputes are not as common as might be expected since the 428 553 [578]

[8] In cases of sudden death or failure to make a will confusion sometimes occurs.

423 is no doubt that a man tends to lose those rights in property
614 which are strictly his, if they are located at a distance. Thus several men claim that they are legally entitled to hunt at Kitlobe, but from mere difficulty of access neither they nor their fathers have exercised the right, and it would have been lost in the course of a few generations, even without the utter decay of custom which has followed the advent of the white man. Practically, a man hunts only in the grounds of those ancestral families in whose origin myths he has names, though, theoretically, he is entitled to hunt on any hunting-ground of any ancestral family of which he is a member whether or not he holds a duly validated name from its origin myth. It is not necessary to confirm the right to property as with a name, though a validated ancestral name is the usual mark of a man's right to that area of the ancestral family to which that designation belongs. Although the ownership of land in distant regions is of little practical importance, it is, none the less, a [554] matter of great pride to a man to feel that he has rights in many places. The efforts of an individual to make good those
[554] is little better than a slave, whereas one who has much land is important.

The Bella Coola regard land as almost inalienable. Though a man does not own the land of his wife's ancestral family, he can use it and his children have full rights to it. Conversely, a wife can gather berries on her husband's land, though it is not hers. A guest at a village may be allowed to use the [574] territory of his hosts, but it does not become his. In the old
927 days wars between the coastal tribes were common, but though slaves were taken freely, land was never seized; such is un-
423 thinkable to a Bella Coola. In fact, several of the older people [567] inquired how it had been possible, in the first world war, for the allies, whose cause they believed to be righteous, to annex territory from Germany. If the victors had killed or enslaved

614 The recent decay of Bella Coola culture may have destroyed
[182] traces of more definite obligations with respect to the ancestral family, but all the evidence indicates that it has always been a fluid unit. Its very lack of functions makes it difficult to [128] discuss, and the above account was pieced together from scraps of information collected from many different people at various times; yet, intangible though it be, it is a very real unit to the Bella Coola and pervades their life. Each individual knows those to whom he is related. In many cases the exact kinship is lost, but it is remembered that a man from such-and-such a village married a woman from another village, and it is proved from the use by their descendants of names from the same origin myth. The concept of physical strength imparted by a closely akin ancestry is always present and gives a person the real "power" in the village founded by those first ancestors
614 of his. For the ancestral family is usually thought of in terms
621 of villages. A man belongs to the village where his first ancestor came to earth, though he is equally a member of other towns into which his ancestors may have married. A [554] man without ancestry, without sel'olam, is a miserable creature; he has no home in this world, or, theoretically, in the world to come. The ancestral family is a unit essentially held together by the ties of sentiment and pride of ancestry.

614 In addition to the above social elements of the ancestral 827 family, it is felt that all its members have certain tendencies. If one of the first ancestors had a certain physical peculiarity, or met with a particular kind of fortune, either good or bad, his descendants are more likely to experience the same than any other people. These tendencies may skip many generations, and may be inherited either through the mother or the father. In fact, Bella Coola belief on this point closely agrees with modern knowledge of heredity; the term for such an inheritable tendency is sällaslim or sällaymadjat. Such characteristics are:

(1) Proficiency in using tools;
(2) Ability as a hunter;

NE5 Bellacoola NE5

614 621 is a more obvious social grouping than the ancestral family, though it is of the latter that a man is most proud. The member of a small, unimportant village often describes himself as a native of a neighbouring, larger one when at a distance from his home, simply as a matter of convenience.

Even before the coming of the white man, village sites were abandoned and people took up their residence with friends or relatives elsewhere. In fact, mythology contains instances of [973] such migrations at the very beginning of time. In cases of this [361] kind, memory of the earlier home has been preserved for many generations, and may perhaps be the explanation of the many villages which are described as two, and which have two names. In the early days immigrants seem always to have been welcome; they added to the numerical strength of the village, and the original inhabitants enjoyed boasting to the newcomers of their descent from the first settlers. Since any group forced to abandon their own homes naturally moved to those of relatives, there is no difficulty in understanding the process by [582] which they continued to intermarry with their new neighbours. Thus two, or even more ancestral families, inhabiting one village tended to form a closely inter-related stock. In rare instances, two unrelated ancestral families may have become inhabitants of the same village, which would unquestionably lead to intermarriage.

In most cases the endogamic tendencies already described cause the village community to be largely members of one ancestral family. In addition there are always other occupants; strangers who have fled from their homes and sought [563] refuge among the Bella Coola; the offspring of illicit intercourse [567] with slaves; guests; foreigners, especially Carriers temporarily [554] resident in Bella Coola; and finally slaves, without status in the community. The real inhabitants, those whose power is firmly planted in the village, are the reputed descendants of the first group of settlers, and accordingly a relative coming to [553] dwell in a village usually endeavours to obtain a name from the origin myth of the ancestral family occupying it, and thus establish himself with the traditions of his new home. This [614] is another illustration of the patrilineal tendency of the whole [553] organization.

Politically, the village is the most important Bella Coola unit. Usually, though not always related to one another, the inhabitants are always friends. If an attack is made on a village by a hostile war-party, all the inhabitants suffer equally. On the other hand, if the residents decide to attack another [628] settlement, there is no compulsion for anyone to share the burden. Each individual, with the exception of slaves, follows his own inclination. In the case of murder or other wrong [682] inflicted by an individual, the responsibility rests on his immediate family, not the village. Factions within the village seem [578] to have been unimportant; individual jealousies were common, [627] and often led to murder, but if a family became unpopular or considered itself aggrieved, it usually moved to another village. Neighbouring settlements were generally on friendly terms and [628] often assisted each other in war, but this was not compulsory. Indeed, cases are known in which a war-party from the outer coast, about to attack Sunsf, passed within a quarter of a mile of Sumpe-ts without its inhabitants even warning their threatened neighbours.

As far as internal organization is concerned, the village is as fluid a unit as are most Bella Coola groupings. If one indi- 622 vidual has attained a position of eminence through the potlatch 554 system (vol. I, chap. IV), he is "chief" of the village, and his [536] advice is generally followed. If several men have approximately the same importance, there is no dominating figure. In any case, a chief lacks executive authority, and such obedience as he receives is due to his personal influence. Some slight deference is paid to the man who uses the name of the eldest of the first group of settlers, the first chief, but this is not sufficient to warrant the title of "chief" with the significance usually attached to the term. The important members of the village 621 are accustomed to meet for the discussion of ceremonial mat- 623 595 796

601 Coola social organization, and of the absence of standardized obligations based upon specific relationships.

Slaves

567 Since a slave was* without status in the Bella Coola community, it is perhaps incorrect to include a description of [554] slavery in a chapter on social organization; but as slaves lived in the Bella Coola villages, it seems reasonable to include them when dealing with the different units of the tribe. It was 162 impossible to obtain an accurate estimate of their number in 567 Bella Coola; slavery has been so long abandoned that the present natives could only hazard vague guesses. Judging from conversational remarks by elderly men, it seems probable that in the old days there was a considerable slave population in every Bella Coola village, comprising at times as much as thirty to forty per cent of the total population.

567 When a party raided a village most of the inhabitants were 927 slain, but some, especially children, young adults, or famous chiefs were captured. As far as could be learned, once a captive had reached Bella Coola he was in little danger, since torture or systematic slaying after the heat of battle had subsided was not a Bella Coola characteristic. The leader of the expedition retained many of the captives as his own slaves, and distributed others among his followers. Anyone, chief [422] or commoner, could own slaves in the same way that he could own any other type of goods.

567 Like any other commodity, slaves were bought and sold. 437 The Bella Coola were usually so well provided with salmon that they were able to exchange these fish with the members [622] of other tribes for slaves. Lack of strong chieftainship among [726] the Bella Coola hindered their success in war, so that most of [431] their slaves were obtained by trade. To the same category [773] belong those obtained as presents at potlatches. If, however, a member of one of the tribes on the lower Fraser River was given as a slave to a Bella Coola, he was treated as a guest.[11] 567 Slaves were bartered between Bella Coola individuals as a [437] matter of course. Their value depended on sex, ability, and [435] industriousness, as well as on supply and demand. When there was an over-supply, the value of a slave fell to twenty or thirty [437] salmon, but whenever an owner found that someone wished to purchase a particular slave he endeavoured to raise the price.

*One of the first efforts of the white man's establishment in British Columbia was the freeing of all slaves. Consequently the past tense is used in this section.

If a foreigner borrowed goods in Bella Coola he usually had to [426] leave a relative as pledge. Thus, not many years ago, a Xuxais- Indian, from near Ootsa Lake, borrowed goods from a Kim-squit man and left his son as pledge. The goods were not returned, so the son was sold as a slave to the people of Kitimat.

It was not uncommon for a Bella Coola to lose his freedom 525 by gambling. At lehql especially, a player who had exhausted 567 his goods not infrequently wagered his children, or in extreme cases, himself. If he lost, his children, or himself, became the property of the winner. Unless speedily repurchased by some relative, such slaves were usually sold or given away at the first opportunity to a member of a foreign tribe, since it was considered improper for a man to hold a member of his own 567 tribe in servitude. The same course of action was taken on [628] those rare occasions when one Bella Coola village fought [727] against its neighbour and prisoners were taken.

To the Bella Coola, who still consider a man's "power" in [554] the land as dependent to a considerable extent on his ancestral myth, a slave's greatest misfortune lay in the fact that he had [773] no ancestral home, and hence no rights.

"No slaves came to earth with the first people," they say.

A slave was a stranger in a strange land, unsupported by a chain of ancestors reaching back to the beginning of time. On [727] the whole, captives taken in war were better treated than other slaves since it was felt that such a misfortune might occur to anyone at any time. They were frequently ransomed by their

[11]This is said to be an ancient practice, due to the fact that several of the forefathers of the Bella Coola came to earth in that region and were on friendly terms with the inhabitants. It is conceivable that this tradition may have reference to the breaking away of the Bella Coola from the main Salish stock. [773]

to arrange his marriage with some female slave; once this had taken place, the actual treatment meted out to him differed only slightly from that shown to a member of the family. In former times it would probably have been difficult for a stranger to tell married slaves from the members of the Bella Coola community until he had been long enough in the country to understand more than appeared on the surface. 567 582

Marriages between Bella Coola men and slave women were not infrequent, while like partnerships between slave men and even the daughters of chiefs were not unknown. In such cases the status of the children depended on the performance of ceremonies to wash from them the stain of their slave blood. While the mother was still pregnant her husband would call guests, not only from his own village, but from foreign tribes as well. Presents were given, according to the wealth of the donor, often aided by his immediate family, to "wash the child." Such ceremonies would be repeated several times before birth, and again at that time. Bella Coola sentiment was that such presents gagged the recipients; they knew of the dishonourable ancestry of the child, but the receipt of gifts on his account had wiped away the disgrace. Such a child was able to inherit prerogatives from his mother's old home, duly validated in Bella Coola by valuables, and by his own lavish presents he could silence those who remembered the blot on his ancestry. Similar procedure was carried out if a free woman married a slave. Unless her husband were already owned by one of her family, the woman's father or brother would arrange to purchase him. Then, aided by him, they would give the same type of presents to clear the children from the taint of slavery. If this were not done, the children had only the status of slaves, though, born and brought up in Bella Coola and associating from infancy with their master's children, they were virtually considered members of the family. 431 567 [428]

"Washing the child," during pregnancy and at birth, sufficed to cover the taint on its history, but in later years if such a person failed to continue to give ceremonies, people would again talk of his short-comings. So, too, for the child or grand- [554] [578]

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

431 child of a mixed Bella Coola and slave marriage. As long as 567 such an one maintained a position of importance in the com-
578 munity by the distribution of presents, nothing was said, but if he should fail to do so, he could be, and frequently was, insulted by having references made to his ancestry. In case [554] of dispute or rivalry it was always a temptation to refer to such a blot, but if he had atoned for it with presents, references were considered improper. Unquestionably, memory of slave
554 ancestry was forgotten in course of time if the line was influ-
567 ential, although recollections of the stigma were always carried for at least two or three generations. At the present time the most influential woman in Bella Coola, the one who has given most presents, is the granddaughter of a Smith Inlet slave. This man had lived in Bella Coola for many years and had married another slave, by whom he had a son. The latter became the husband of an influential Stuix woman. When she became pregnant, her family secured the liberation of her husband, and gave many presents to "wash the child." One daughter was born to this couple, the woman just mentioned. Her mother's relatives were influential, and her father was

To sum up, it may be said that the position of slaves in Bella Coola was not particularly onerous, though it depended entirely on the will of their masters. Without status in the [182] community, a slave could have been abused by a cruel owner, though the public life of the village, where all lived and ate together, tended to break down the unsystematically enforced differences of rank.

CHAPTER IV

RANK

Chieftainship—Sisaok Society—The Potlatch

CHIEFTAINSHIP

IN the previous chapter have been described the beliefs of the Bella Coola concerning the origin of names, and the attitude of pride with which they regard those embodied in ancestral myths, which carry with them prized prerogatives. But the unsystematic method by which ancestral names are inherited is sufficient to show that their possession, though valued for sentimental reasons, is not enough to make the owner a chief. On what, then, is Bella Coola chieftainship based? Expressed briefly, it depends on the number and value of presents distributed at any kind of ceremonial. To the Bella Coola, every rite, whether it be a marriage, the bestowal of a name, a dance, a type of funeral, or admission into a secret society, is a prerogative intimately associated with the myth by which the performance is authorized. Accordingly, the host is really displaying the glories of his ancestors before the eyes of guests present at the ceremony. To the Bella Coola it is unthinkable for such to be performed without the giving of presents to all; failure to do so would destroy the value of the prerogative. The potlatch is the ceremonial at which the most lavish generosity is displayed, but the principle of the acquisition of prestige by the giving of presents is the same for all other rites; the only difference is that at a potlatch a man is able to display his generosity to a larger number of recipients. In consequence, the aim of every ambitious man is to hold potlatches, since his status in the community virtually rests on his ability in this respect. The ritual of a potlatch will be given in detail in the latter part of this chapter, but its complications will be intelligible only after a description of the the writer was in Bella Coola, a non-ceremonial entertainment was given one evening at which several men sang and performed. The writer was asked to sing a Bella Coola song, which he did in the belief that it was not one that was incorporated in the ancestral myth of anyone. Unfortunately, his teacher had erred, and as soon as the song was completed an old woman arose and stated that it belonged to her ancestral family. She avoided the difficulty of its singing by immediately announcing that the singer was her "son." Thus the writer was adopted into a Bella Coola family, a circumstance which aided him considerably in collecting information. This did not alter the fact that a ceremonial song had been sung. Accordingly, the woman gave presents to the guests, thereby legalizing the adoption, and saving herself from the disgrace of having one of her songs used as if it were a matter of no consequence, free to anyone.

SEATING

Presents are also a means of obtaining seats. Every Bella Coola has at least one name embodied in an ancient myth. A man who wishes to become a chief can do so only by giving lavish presents to make his designation "strong," "firm," or "bright," to use Bella Coola expressions. Such gifts increase the importance of the owner's name, and they obtain for him the right to a seat, more or less definitely located, in the house. Since all Bella Coola habitations are built on similar lines, a man can occupy his wonted position when summoned to a ceremony in any house. The validating of ancestral names and the acquisition of seats are among the important features which occur at potlatches.

[622]
[424]
[553]

In the beginning of time, when the first people were sent down to populate the earth, it is assumed that each who established a village, consisting of a single house, seated himself in the best spot within the dwelling, namely the central position behind the fire; his younger relatives ranged either beside him

[773]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

554 or sat in two rows, facing one another, on opposite sides of the
* 556 central fire, parallel to the side walls of the house. When these [773] first ancestors died, the name of each was passed on to some [551] descendant. The Bella Coola feel that he who bears the name
[171] of the first settler in a village should have his ancestor's seat. Comparison with the practices of other coastal tribes suggests that formerly the Bella Coola must have had a definite series of seats in their houses, either according to the rank of the occupant, or according to the rank of the ancestor whose name he bore. The most careful investigation, however, failed to show such a system of ranked seating. The only indications that such may once have been customary, are found in the feeling today that the bearer of the first chief's name ought to occupy the central seat behind the fire, and in the expression, "He seats himself where his ancestor sat," when a youth is given his place in the house.

[551] A seat can be claimed and an ancestral name assumed at any age. Goods must be given away which are said to be "covering" for the young man, to have "flowed away," or to have "become nothing" for the name. These validate the official assumption of the designation. With it is given a place in the house. A seat is chosen at the side of the fire, and the goods mark that spot as his in conjunction with the name.
[424] The seat itself is not material, though the general location on which a person shall sit is indicated. His "seat" is the goods that have been expended. Several men may have positions at practically the same spot, but when all are seated they merely move slightly so that all have room. There is no thought of one person infringing on the location of another. A parent who gives ample wealth at successive potlatches may seek for his son a seat behind the fire. Such is entirely his own affair and if sufficient goods are distributed the son may seat himself in that place, but if the gifts are of little value the occupant is secretly held in derision, as having a seat that is unsound, or unfirm. In later years the man may expend large sums in strengthening his seat; by so doing he wins recognition from all that he sits in an enviable spot, irrespective of its location in the house. 554● 556*

In precisely the same manner a man may take for himself a seat in the central part of the row behind the fire, but he is laughed at for endeavouring to assume a dignity, unworthily, unless he can validate his position by lavish presents. The Bella Coola are always ready to make fun of a person who fails to maintain his seat. On the death of the occupant of the central position it is taken for granted that whoever inherits his name will assume that location and give the essential presents, but it is not incumbent upon him to do so. He may choose to establish his new name at his old station, beside, instead of behind, the fire. Thus it has come to pass that the seat of the most important chief of a village is often at the side of the house. When all are seated the chiefs may be widely separated, and a parent may have obtained for his son a seat in a better part of the house than his own. But as a rule the chiefs sit in a row at the back of the fire, the most influential one in the middle. There must have been feuds when two men desired to seat themselves in the central position at the same time, but disputes about this were uncommon, because a man's seat was, and still is, primarily regarded as the intangible goods wherewith he is clothed, rather than his right to sit at any particular spot. It is these non-material coverings that enable a man to be bold and assertive in argument or suggestion, in fact to be a chief. A young man may have had conferred on him one of the noblest names, but his influence depends on the value of the goods expended on his behalf, subject of course to the universal characteristic that a man of forceful character may have more influence than his actual position warrants. [424] [428] [622] [424]

Jealous feuds are common when the man who owns the name of the first chief, first ancestor of a village, has duly validated it, but is being eclipsed in the giving of potlatches by a man whose name is of less intrinsic importance. Such a complication recently arose at Kimsquit, and the Bella Coola [578] [682]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

554 ascribe two murders which took place there in 1915 to jealousy engendered by rivalry.

* 556 A chief who desires to have his son, or other near relative, [578] succeed to his actual seat may validate for him a position at [682] his feet. If several potlatches be given, with distribution of goods for this purpose, it becomes recognized that the son shall [622] take his father's seat. None the less, he will not have his father's influence or prestige unless he can himself continue to give away goods, because the power of a chief rests on this, not on his ancient name or the location of his seat.

553 Further evidence that a man's influence rests less on his * 556 actual name than on the wealth distributed with reference to it is found in the lack of uniformity in the type of names validated. Those of highest potential importance are the ones brought to the earth by the first-comers, yet in many cases a man prefers to elevate his position with respect to a name of later origin. It is not uncommon for a man to validate several ancestral designations, and choose one of them to be his most important by valuable gifts for the seat which he occupies with respect to it; or in other cases a name of modern origin is selected and elevated. Thus, a certain Bella Coola chief who is the legal owner of the names Q̓eil and Xemlaix, two of the first people to settle this earth, has based his greatness on the goods expended for a seat with reference to the name Siälxeläx, of more modern origin. It is accordingly clear that any Bella Coola can rise to a position of importance, even though he lacks the right to one of the most ancient names. Moreover, some chiefs prefer to validate several names rather than concentrate on one alone.

[622] Furthermore, a powerful chief can create a name. In this case the "power" of the designation rests, not in any supernatural origin, but in the actual wealth distributed. Two examples will serve to illustrate this point. Between 1880 and 1890 a chief was preparing to give a potlatch at which his nephew was to receive a name, when fire destroyed the village with the exception of his house. This added to the value of the food and goods distributed, since it was winter and the 553 people were in dire straits on account of the destruction of all 556* their stores. In consequence, the uncle decided to make a new name for his nephew, Skämł, "Charred Wood." By virtue of the goods expended this name became an honourable title, and was maintained by lavish presents. Any similar incident connected with a potlatch can be made the origin of a designation. Another example of a manufactured name is one derived from a peculiarity of the man giving the potlatch. A number of years ago a chief was jeered at by his associates on account of the frequency with which he had to visit the toilet. When next he gave a potlatch he created the name Ăpstel·a, "The Toilet One," and gave great dignity to the designation by presents.

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

Since a seat is valuable only on account of the goods ex- 554
pended in obtaining it with respect to a certain name, it is 556*
obvious that names and seats are closely associated. A man who wishes his son to succeed to his own location in the house seats the youth, as has been described, at his feet. It may be a matter of years before he actually takes his father's position, but during that time he is treated with respect; he is still a commoner, but it is recognized that his parent considers him likely to "make good" and become a true chief by ability to give presents. Should he fail to do so, inexorably his influence wanes, in spite of his name and duly validated seat. He keeps the latter, but it is no longer considered one of importance. Thus, too, the course of names from generation to generation [551] is a series of curves; sometimes one is on a pinnacle of glory when "made strong" by a powerful chief, but in the next generation it may fall to the dust through ownership by a [195] weakling. As the Bella Coola express it: It has become hermaphroditized.

A woman is rarely established in a seat, and usually only [562] when a chief has no sons or other near male descendants. In such a case she receives an ancestral name and has the same status as a male chief. At the present time one important

554 chief had thus obtained a seat for his daughter, as well as ones for his two sons. But usually a woman continues to use the * 556 ancestral name given to her in infancy until she is able to 562 assist her husband in a potlatch, when a name is validated for [553] her (see I, p. 410). The ancestral names of the first women to occupy this earth are reserved for women and, like men's names, vary in prestige according to the prowess of their owners. Most names given to children, though embodied in [551] origin myths, are applicable to either sex; and these are the common designations of women. Cases are known in which a woman has assumed an ancestral name if her brother has allowed it to fall into ill-repute through failure to give potlatches.

554 With such a fluid system, no fixed line can be drawn between chief and commoner. But after his fourth potlatch a
* 556 man's influence in the community has become so great that 622 he will usually feel justified in having the carpenters make for [352] him a material seat. There is nothing to prevent a person having one made for him before he has given the requisite number of potlatches, but too rapid assumption may render him liable to the scorn of the community through his failure to show himself sufficiently "strong." The contempt shown [626] to anyone attempting to usurp too lofty a place is a strong deterrent to a proud young man.

in other words the forms in which his first ancestors came to [352] earth, or some of the beings with whom they came in contact. To show these is a matter of pride, but unless the display is fittingly validated, the man's own dignity will be lowered, as well as that of his ancestors. Construction of a seat is particularly common when a man is establishing himself in the central position behind the fire, and claims this to be where his first ancestor sat. Others among the first people may have chosen seats in other parts of the house, and in these, likewise, a man who is taking his ancestral name may have a material seat constructed. Establishment in such a position increases a chief's feeling of mental superiority, as if strengthened by the age-long power of his ancestor. Finally, in old age a powerful chief is careless where he seats himself; his fame is so great that he can afford to disregard all conventions. 554 ● 556 * 622 [183]

POWER OF CHIEFS

It will be seen from the foregoing that chieftainship among the Bella Coola does not depend on hereditary rank, still less on an elective principle, but on the individual's prestige as displayed, especially in his ability to acquire for himself a firm seat by the giving of presents. As he continues to do so his influence becomes ever greater. Consequently, it is impossible to state clearly what are the powers of a chief; such depend upon his prestige and influence. For a Bella Coola chief has no executive or judicial authority; what deference is shown to him depends on his success as a man, a factor which is constantly rising or falling.

The coming of the white man has enabled the Bella Coola [177] to earn comparatively large sums of money by trapping and fishing. This in turn has enabled nearly everyone to give at [434] least one potlatch, a very different state of affairs from that which prevailed in the last century when it required years of toil for a man to amass the necessary food and skins. Consequently, in many towns there were no men who had given potlatches, so that a man's prestige was estimated by the [431] presents he had given at smaller ceremonies. Sometimes, [535] moreover, a man preferred to increase his fame by giving rites of a different nature, such as kusiut dances, and the presents then distributed might elevate him in the eyes of the community, to a position above that of a man who had given a potlatch. This, however, was unusual.

After a fourth potlatch a man is accorded a position of eminence, and is termed a numitl chief. Numitl is an untranslatable word, with the significance of "passage," an allusion to the amount of goods which have passed through his hands. Jealous and vulgar-minded persons pun on the word, applying [578]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

554 it to the digestive tract. After a man has given four potlatches 556 he feels superior to those who have been unable to do likewise.
622 His name is "bright," "clean," "heavy," "firm," or "upright"
[578] in Bella Coola terms, and so, likewise, his seat. He feels independent and proud. Such a chief will fearlessly enter the back-room where ceremonial rites are taking place, even if not entitled to do so.

"He is so strong, he can go where he will," say the Bella Coola.

The advice of such a man is taken because of his ability and prestige, especially by the members of his own family. A few years ago, for example, when a certain Bella Coola died, his brother wished a kusiut name-prerogative of the deceased to pass to the dead man's daughter. The girl's mother's father, a numitl chief, objected, and his desires were followed, although the name in question was not connected in any way with his family. In small matters, too, people gladly carry out the

"You bet," the old man answered emphatically with a dry chuckle.

231 It is difficult now to form an accurate estimate, from obser-
552 vation, of the influence of chiefs solely through virtue of the 622 goods they have expended. But the following is a concrete example. In November, 1923, the writer, while walking through the Bella Coola village, was bitten by a dog. He was told that the animal belonged to a certain old woman. When next he saw the owner he asked her whether she knew that her dog attacked passers-by.

"Yes," she answered, in a matter-of-fact tone, "He is a chief and can do what he likes."

Further questioning elicited the information that the old
[766] woman and her husband, the childless last survivors of an ancestral family, had transmitted some of their ancestral

*556 574 [203] Although guests from different tribes are sometimes invited to other ceremonials, it is at potlatches that they are essential. Since the validity of such transactions as marriages, divorces, or the assumption of professional prerogatives depends on the presence of witnesses, and since the importance of such a rite depends on the number of witnesses, a man is always eager to carry out any public performance at a potlatch when he is sure of the attention of foreigners, and the consequent wider diffusion of knowledge of what he has done. The man who has invited guests is usually willing to allow others to perform at his potlatch, since it increases the complexity and importance [184] of the affair. It follows that no two potlatches are alike; one will contain features entirely lacking in another. Moreover, the wealth of the donor determines how many rites he himself will cause to be performed. The fundamental concept of the potlatch is the inviting of guests from abroad to witness rites [769] in connection with an ancestral myth, especially the return of a recently deceased relative of the donor to visit the living.

*556 796 At any important potlatch the following rites are carried out, and in the account of the ritual it will be assumed that these alone are taking place. If the reader bears this summary in mind, he is less likely to be confused by the complication of rites.

(1) The return of a dead ancestor to visit the living.

[575] [553] (2) The initiation of young men or women into the susask society. This includes the validation of a susask name for each, and a period of seclusion in the back-room. The initiates may either be relatives of the donor of the potlatch, or young persons whose relatives are taking the opportunity to carry out the rite in the presence of foreigners. Some of the initiates may already be members of the society, undergoing a further period of seclusion in order to increase their status by a further distribution of presents.

[554] [858] [583] (3) The payment by the wife of the donor and her family of goods to "rebuy" her from her husband. This is a legal fiction, though necessary to maintain the status of the children.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

(4) The strengthening of the donor's seat. 556*

(5) The strengthening, or initial establishment, of seats for a number of young relatives of the donor who may, or may not, be those who are being initiated into the nusek society. Other youths may also be established on seats by their relatives. 796

The duration of a potlatch varies with the number of rites being performed. The preliminaries, including the beginning of seclusion for nusek initiates, requires at least several weeks, in some cases months. There is further delay of a week or more after the arrival of the first guests, as only when the last party has arrived can the actual potlatch begin. This can then be completed in three days and nights, although if many initiates are performing their nusek dances, a longer time is required.

What are the consequences of giving a potlatch?

In the first place the donor spreads the fame of his name far and wide, also the myth with which it is incorporated. Thus he increases the renown of his ancestors, a source of intense pride and gratification. 556*

More important even than this, it elevates the donor himself. With the proper carrying out of the complicated ritual and the knowledge that his name is now known among different tribes, a man experiences a feeling of mental superiority which enables him to take a leading part in the affairs of his community. In Bella Coola a chief (stâhmq) is a person whose influence is paramount owing to his success in giving potlatches.* If several chiefs in one village have given potlatches, he who has given most is generally of greatest importance, although often a man of forceful character who has held, for example, five potlatches will be regarded with greater respect than one of lesser weight, even if he has given six. The whole system is exceedingly fluid, as might be expected where chieftainship depends on individual prowess. In theory, the man who holds the name of the first person to occupy a village, at

*Particularly if he has given four potlatches and can accordingly be described as a nuxnit chief (I, p. 172). In nuxnit songs the archaic word sitkamenk is also sometimes employed for "chief."

* 556 622 the time the earth was settled, ought to be chief of that village. If he has been able to give the necessary potlatches to weight his possession of that name, the fact that he is the legal descendant of the first chief will add a certain amount to his prestige, but unless he has been able to do this his influence will be slight.

* 556 622 766 [775] Thirdly, potlatches smooth the way for the giver after death. Before the corpse of a chief is removed from the house where he has died, a speaker always announces the number of potlatches he has given and the total value of goods distributed at them. These gifts in a vague way are felt to make easy the deceased's path in the next world as they have done in the present. The feature of the potlatch, though firmly believed by some of the older people, plays a less important part in the life of the Bella Coola than might be expected.

[424] (1) Possession of an ancient myth, containing a name or names. Probably every Bella Coola has this requirement. A man's family may not be the proud owners of one of the ancestral myths dealing with the first settlement of this earth, but they will at least own some ancient myth which they can elevate by giving a potlatch. As has been said, the owner of one of the most ancient names in many cases chooses to elevate one of lesser antiquity, a course which must, perforce, be done by one who lacks an origin myth. The slight feeling of deference with which those are regarded who hold the names of the [554] first inhabitants of the earth, the mighty chiefs of old, is subordinate to the very real feeling of respect in which is held the successful giver of potlatches. The descendant of one of the first people has the potential right to chieftainship, but unless he can give potlatches he will fail to gain that eminence.

* 556 769 (2) An occasion for giving a potlatch is never lacking. It consists of a number of closely associated rites, any one of which will serve as a reason for the ceremony. The most important feature, the return of a dead ancestor or ancestors to visit the living, is available to anyone at any time. The Bella

[575] their heads one or more weasel skins as a mark of membership
[237] in the society. Each takes the seat to which he is entitled,
[292] the chiefs behind the fire, or on either side of it, the commoners,
[558] slaves, and foreigners in the two corners nearest the door. The heralds move to and fro between door and fire, their constant exchange of remarks adding to the general interest of the affair. It is the function of a herald to lend dignity to chiefs by
[203] the tone of his observations, but should one fail to live up to his station, the herald is privileged to comment thereon. In some respects his position approximates that of a buffoon, but as a herald always receives valuable presents, the office is sometimes accepted by ambitious young men, willing to undertake the slightly derogatory duties in return for the substantial gain.

264 A number of young lads, friends or relatives of X, distribute the food. It is placed in boxes; an important chief is not called
* 556 upon to share with any one, whereas six or seven men of no
[183] standing may partake from one box. These receptacles, with whatever food remains in them, are taken home by the guests; otherwise the host would be insulted. Many boxes are lost in [378] this way, a source of considerable irritation. After the first course, a second follows, consisting of a different kind of food in another box, and in some cases there is a third, and even a fourth course. A chief must never appear stingy. The more he gives, the more does his prestige increase. Also, a man who gives freely receives abundantly, so that generosity brings its reward.

589 Next, the father or other male relative of X's wife, or a
* 556 fluent friend who speaks for him, stands up and makes a speech, [537] extolling the fame of his own family by sketching in general outlines one of the myths of his ancestors, and announcing that [425] X's wife is taking to her husband some portion of it. This may [424] be the prerogative of using a spoon carved, for example, with [582] the shape of a beaver; or a carved box, or a totem-pole with certain figures on it, or the right to use a painting of a grizzly bear on the wall of his house, or an ancestral name.

As the dances proceed, those women who have the prerogative for doing so, utter a peculiar droning cry. After dancing, the initiates return to the back-room, where they doff their attire. The ceremony concludes with the distribution of food. 535 556 * 575 [424]

The initiates are now free to leave their place of concealment, as each has become a legal member of the sisaek society. Some young men, sons of influential chiefs, are secluded a number of times, others but once. The oftener a youth is secluded, the greater is his prestige, because goods must be distributed on each occasion to validate his name. At the present time, there is considerable uncertainty about the exact details of the ceremony, for it has been so easy of late years to give potlatches that the simpler rite has fallen into disuse; some informants state that each initiate should emerge alone and dance by himself. This concludes the shorter ceremony, but with a potlatch the dancing is reserved until the coming of the foreign guests. [554]

Returning now to preparations for the true potlatch; it does not matter whether the ceremonies already described are carried out before or after the departure of messengers to invite guests from abroad. Although X usually consults his relatives and friends as to whom he shall invite, this is entirely optional. In giving his invitations X is actuated, first, by a desire to summon those from whom he has previously received hospitality; having accepted presents from them he must discharge the obligations or sink in social estimation. Considerations of friendship also enter into his selection, and he will likewise invite anyone whom he wishes to put to shame by a lavish display of wealth. It is taken as a matter of course that each guest will be accompanied by a number of followers, members of his family, slaves, or adherents. 556* [203] [558]

Acting on X's instructions, a herald invites the people of his village to X's house. X stands up and announces to them [203] [484]

* 556 The first course is dried coboe salmon mixed with olachen 264 grease. The fish is first placed in boxes, approximately one to every four persons, though a chief may be honoured by an [262] individual box, and the grease poured over it. As always, any food not consumed is carried away. Failure to do so would [578] be an insult to X. Then round wooden dishes are distributed into which are poured the berries of Viburnum pauciflorum.
[262] The waiters pour olachen grease over these and the mixture is eaten with wooden spoons. These two foods are invariably the first meal of a potlatch.

* 556 If the siki of the last guests to arrive has not returned the 575 power given him by the Bella Coola expert, he now stands up and shakes his rattle as a signal that he desires to start his 535 dance. The Bella Coola siki also stands up, and the visiting siki contorts himself and finally pretends to produce something from his stomach, which he throws across to his colleague.
The latter feigns to catch it, cries hoip loudly several times, and makes the motions of hurling what he has just received into the room at the back of the house where the initiates are concealed. Then he sits down. Meanwhile the last-to-arrive party of guests have started to beat out the tune of one of the sisook[19] songs of their own siki who dances in time to it. Then another song is beaten out and another member of the party dances, and so on until all have danced who desire to do so.
Each wears his own head-dress and each performs in the manner already described. After the dancing, the members of this party of guests give presents to X and other Bella Coola chiefs. There is no fixed ratio between the value of the gifts
* 556 and the rank of the recipients, though chiefs receive more than
• [554] lesser men, and X most of all. These presents are spandjat, which may be translated as "eagle down-ness," merely a mark of friendship and goodwill. They are not returnable. Goods so received are distributed by X with his other possessions at [578] the potlatch, care being taken not to return them to the donors, which would be insulting.

[19] Ko-do songs (I, p. 187) are sometimes used.

After bestowal of these presents, the siki of the penultimate group of guests shakes his rattle, and exactly the same procedure is carried out by members of his party. They, too, give presents to X and the other Bella Coola chiefs. The same rites are carried out by each party of guests in the reverse order of their arrival. It is frequently near dawn before the first-comers have completed their dances and distribution of gifts. X then gives another meal to all, with no restriction on the choice of food. This concludes the night's ceremony, and the guests depart, except those who are staying in X's house. 556

THE POTLATCH: FIRST DAY

Considering the lengthy ceremonials of the preceding evening, it is not surprising that on this day no one stirs early. The guests receive their breakfast in the houses where they are accommodated, and meanwhile a number of young men gather in X's house to assist in the preparation of food for the main meal of the day. During the previous night a large amount of smoked mountain goat has been put in water to soak. This is now placed in a number of food-boxes, ready for distribution, water is added and hot stones lifted in to bring it to a boil. When the water comes to the boil, mountain goat grease is added, and then bearberries; it is usually about two o'clock in the afternoon before the meal is ready. The guests are summoned and the food given them, the chiefs, as usual, receiving more than those of lower rank. After eating they disperse to await the evening rites. [251] [252] [554]

It was impossible to obtain an accurate account of the ritual carried out on the evening of this, the first day of the potlatch proper. The ceremonial was of less importance than those preceding and following, and it has long fallen into disuse. The guests take up their accustomed places, and the Bella Coola members of the nuxut range themselves near them and behind the fire. The corners near the door are occupied by non-members of the society. The singers beat out two of [182] 556 575 [535]

THE PROFESSION OF CARPENTER

As with singers, there are many carpenters who ply their trade without the advantage of an ancestral prerogative. They, also, may be expert and receive credit for their skill, but they can never achieve quite the distinction that comes to a man who has been made a carpenter by the distribution of presents. The latter may be so clumsy with tools that no one would ever trust him to make a canoe, or even a mask; but he is, socially, a carpenter, whereas a skilled artisan lacking a prerogative is admired for his ability but has no foundation of social esteem. In transmitting a professional carpenter's name, however, an effort is always made to give it to a youth with a bent in that direction.

The most esteemed carpenters are those who can make canoes, a trade which requires no special prerogative. In the beginning of time, Yaldzimat was the canoe-maker par excellence; he assisted many of the first people, and no one can have a professional prerogative as carpenter unless this supernatural being appears in his ancestral myth. The Bella Coola ascribe the skill of the Bella Bella in carpentry to the fact that Yaldzimat married a Bella Bella woman in the early period of the world and that many of that tribe are his descendants. In the old days, before the coming of the white men, carpenters were always respected as esteemed members of the community. Chiefs always cared for them, and they received abundant food at every ceremonial. None the less, they were not wealthy, and only in recent years, since the Bella Coola have realized the value put upon good craftsmanship by the white men, has it become customary to give valuable presents to carpenters. Ceremonially, they have considerable influence, since the carpenter who makes a mask usually decides who shall wear it and takes charge of the fitting and adjustment. He is also held responsible for any accident such as its falling when in use or for mechanical defects.

881 bundle of four macaroni-shaped shells, probably Dentalium, [301] which are said to have been imported from the north in early 434 times. These marks serve to indicate the position of the girl, who is both feared and respected, possessed of supernatural 789 power, and yet baneful. Many Bella Coola stories describe how adolescent girls have been able to vanquish supernatural [536] beings; perhaps the most striking of these is the manner in which they once saved mankind when the sun came too close to the earth. At the end of a year, or eleven months according to one old woman, the seclusion is terminated, and the girl resumes her normal activities. The first time she goes to the river she must throw on the water four pieces of dyed, and four pieces of undyed cedar-bark. This is especially important if the salmon are running at the time, although no explanation of this ritual is given.

582 The resumption of her freedom indicates that a girl has 556 reached marriageable age. Chiefs sometimes confine their 882 daughters for even longer than a year, and usually delay their marriages for several years to demonstrate their importance; but this is not necessary, nor is it practised by other than wealthy individuals. It is not uncommon for a girl to wed before her year is out; in that case her restrictions automatically [554] lapse. Chiefs never allow such a curtailment for their daughters; to do so would diminish the prestige of the latter, and be detrimental to the status of their children when they marry
886 and have families. Illicit intercourse with a secluded adoles-
883 cent is considered not only illegal but disgusting as well. Be-[881] tween the period of confinement and marriage, intercourse is prohibited and guarded against by the parents of a girl, but is not considered filthy and seems to have been fairly common in former times with the daughters of poor people and slaves. This sometimes took place before the first menstruation in spite of the disapproval with which this was regarded.

886 Although the menstrual blood which appears at the first
841 discharge is considered more baneful than that emitted on later 789 occasions, it is always regarded as uncanny or unclean. It is

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

855 rebuked. They grow up in the open environment of the [861] houses, absorbing more of their lore by watching and imitat-[854] ing than by actual instruction. Their care devolves chiefly on the mother, although at any ceremony the father will be seen arriving with the baby in his arms, while his wife leads another child. Nurses are unknown and the parents take their children with them on all occasions; if it is necessary for a mother to be absent on some arduous toil, her child will be entrusted to a grandmother or other elderly relative. There are no avoidances between the young people and their 606 parents-in-law.

The obligation of present-giving does not stop with the 602 marriage ceremony. Whenever X gives a kusiut dance or other 431 ceremony, Y's relatives are expected to contribute. It is felt that the weight of the presents given them during the period of engagement and at the wedding has become too heavy, and they throw this off by lavish giving. No count is kept of the value of gifts bestowed or received, though it is known that the family of the woman loses financially in the end. The father of many daughters is regarded as an unfortunate individual, who is always poor and overworked through the necessity of [554] providing for them. By so doing, however, he increases his own prestige, and the Bella Coola have the happy sentiment that such a man manages to get along some way; perhaps necessity rouses his ambition. Likewise X's relatives contribute to any ritual carried out by Y's father. If, for example, one of his wife's relatives dies, X and his friends may wish to contribute towards the funeral expenses. In fact, any cere-[556] monial serves as an excuse for relatives by marriage to donate goods and thus demonstrate publicly their influence, importance, and generosity.

602 The concept of mutual help between families who have 476 intermarried is one that lasts for generations. In 1922 there was in Bella Coola an old Kimsquit man who had left home some forty years earlier and had since lived in Smith Inlet where he married and had a boy. On the death of his wife, this

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

567 ceremony usually consisted simply of the man and woman
588 living together. In theory, this prevented the children from ever obtaining a name or other prerogative embodied in the ancestral myth of the free-born parent, and an effort was always made to conceal from them the details of the ancestral family's origin myth. But, as already described in the section dealing with slaves, the expenditure of valuable presents served to eradicate, or at least to cover, the blot. If the child succeeded in giving many potlatches, the stain was generally
[554] forgotten. On the other hand, if the child of a slave married to a free man was not "washed," he could always be shamed by a reminder of the disgrace of his parents' wedding.

682 In case of murder, the son or other near relative of the victim sometimes accepts a daughter or other member of the [583] offender's family instead of exacting blood revenge. The bride
[627] is delivered to her husband with valuable goods "to wash away the blood," but these never suffice entirely to remove the disgrace from her or her children. The latter may inherit names and prerogatives from their father, but even if they attain to the position of chiefs, they can always be put to shame by reference to their mother's marriage as an atonement for murder. Of course the influence of a great chief makes it impolitic to refer to his ancestry, and there are a few instances of men having reached such a position of eminence that the blot
[554] has been practically forgotten. The wife's family must continue to give presents to the husband for years after marriage, otherwise her lot is unenviable indeed, and her children have the status of the unwashed offspring of a slave and a free-man. In some cases a marriage of this type is entered upon years after a murder, if a son or other descendant wishes to end the anxiety of constantly expecting blood revenge.

REPURCHASE OF THE WIFE

556 Repurchase of a wife is the necessary consequence of every 583 reputable Bella Coola marriage. It is assumed that the pre-

556 prerogatives he is transmitting, Y's father usually takes the 583 opportunity of stating that he wishes to hunt on X's hunting-
[425] grounds, or fish in his fishing-grounds. Permission is never refused, though it is only for the period of the potlatch. Since Y's father is to assist X, it is considered fitting to grant him facilities for obtaining pelts and food.

It is on the afternoon of the second day of the potlatch that the goods are delivered. They serve six purposes, which can be described separately, although the Bella Coola usually think of them as being too closely associated for division.

(1) They increase the dignity, influence, and prestige of the donors. This theme needs no further elaboration. When X later gives these presents to his foreign guests, he announces the person from whom he has received them and in this way knowledge of the manner in which Y's relatives have upheld the dignity of the marriage is spread far and wide, to their intense gratification.

(2) They help X to rise to a position of influence in the community by the credit which comes to him from their later distribution. Though a man may acquire goods in various ways, the Bella Coola affirm that without contributions from his wife's relatives no man can become a chief.

(3) They validate the transmission of names, or other prerogatives, taken by Y to her husband. Even presents given [606] directly from father-in-law to son-in-law are always said to have been taken by the daughter to her husband.

(4) Indirectly, they increase the prestige of the children,
[554] either born at that time or who may appear later. None of the goods used for repurchasing their mother can actually be used for their benefit, but the whole rite gives them strength to succeed in life. A child whose mother has not been repurchased is said to be unable to walk, as if his legs were powerless; he lacks intelligence, and the ability to prosper. From the [578] petty quarrels of childhood until old age, a person is proud to recall the number of times his mother was rebought, and to thrust this statement in the teeth of those less fortunate.

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

(5) They govern Y's status in this world. When women quarrel, as they often do, the most common boast to shame a less wealthy rival is a reminder of the number of times the speaker was repurchased and the value of the goods used. 556 583 [578]

"I can sit down on fifteen canoes," or "I am carried by five slaves," says the angry woman, mentioning whatever goods were used for her repurchase.

(6) Finally, these goods serve a more definite purpose in obtaining for Y a name, or names, of which the value is directly proportionate to the expenditure, precisely as the importance of a chief's designation depends on the goods used to validate it. [553]

As with men's names, some women's appellations were given by Älquntäm to the first arrivals; others were created on this earth with regard to peculiar events, and still others are names which can be used either by men or women. Theoretically, the dignity of the first type of name is greater than either of the others, but in practice the importance of the owner depends on the number of times she has bought herself from her husband; the principles governing the rank of women are thus the same as those already described for men. The term yetsalt, applied to a woman who has many times rebought herself and so reached a position of eminence, is the feminine equivalent to stältum. The creation of women's names in reference to personal characteristics or incidents connected with their married life is more common than similar creations for men. The ritual of the bestowal of a name on Y, here given, was omitted from the description of the potlatch in order to lessen the complexity of that ceremony. It will be remembered that on the afternoon of the second day of the potlatch Y's relatives appear outside X's house, carrying valuable presents. 551 556 583 [554] [562] 553 556 583

The announcer calls out that Y's father has come to give "food" to X and his relatives. By food, presents are meant, which are the return, with interest, of the gifts given by X's relatives on various occasions. The giver is announced, for other relatives than Y's father contribute, and to whom the

588 it, although it is customary for the parents of a wife to exhibit 556 their wealth on several occasions.

What are the advantages of such an agreement to the two parties? The husband receives considerable assistance, both in actual goods and in ceremonial prerogatives. Moreover, his vanity is gratified by the desire shown by others to have him as husband of their daughters. The advantages to the wife are more difficult to describe. Financially, her relatives always lose, yet they consider that the prestige gained by their daughter as wife of a mighty chief fully compensates for their monetary loss. Accordingly, they take pains to have a daughter married several times before puberty, either simultaneously or [595] in succession. Thus there is a form of ceremonial polyandry existing in Bella Coola at the present day. No ceremonial marriage takes place after puberty. In later years, when the [554] wife grows up, marries, and has children of her own, their status is increased materially by the pre-puberty marriages of their mother. They address her fictitious husband as "father," and his children as brother or sister, although there are no incest prohibitions with regard to them. A chief sometimes arranges the bestowal of names or other prerogatives on the children of a fictitious ex-wife, but such favours are too uncertain to provide a motive for the prevalence of the rite. Its value rests on the esteem attached to a woman whose relatives have shown their wealth and prowess by marrying her several times. When her children quarrel with their playfellows, it is common to hear one boast:

[558] Occasionally the relatives of a fictitious bride are unable to provide the goods to repurchase her from her husband and the girl remains disgraced for life. In no circumstances has her husband any claims to marital rights with her, and in due course she can marry someone else; but it is never forgotten that she was not rebought from her husband. In 1916 a girl about four years of age was married to a man of sixty, who at the time gave her relatives $80 and a motor boat. She had body became eagle down and was wafted upwards is psychologically of the type which might serve as basis for a rite of this kind. If the descendants of the person to whom this had happened had dramatized the incident at subsequent deaths, a custom analogous to the one here described would have arisen. 575 766 424 [773]

DISPOSAL OF THE BODY

There is no fixed time for the disposal of a corpse. When possible, it takes place on the day following death, but as many as four days may elapse if delay is necessary for the performance of the rite just described. Another reason for postponement is the absence of near relatives; if they can be summoned within four or five days, the funeral may be delayed until their arrival. There is always endless discussion concerning the exact details; all relatives and members of the ancestral family take part, though the wishes of a son, brother, or other near kinsman are usually followed. In this, as in so many points of Bella Coola ritual, an influential chief often overrules the desires even of those who are more closely related to the deceased. 764 [796] [554]

Heralds announce the hour chosen,[6] usually about noon, and the people begin to assemble in the deceased's house, even strangers being welcome. Women wail dolorously, and another indication of the occasion is the bundles containing clothing, cooking utensils, and other articles belonging to the dead person. The lid of the coffin has been left open, but when everything is ready, an elderly man is asked to strike it, once, with a stone; then the lid is closed. Planks have been removed and a hole made in one of the front corners of the house, through which the man throws out the stone. The women redouble their lamentations as an old woman, previously asked to do so, lights a bundle of dyed and undyed cedar-bark and climbs through the opening carrying this. No request has been made for pall-bearers, but any strong men, especially [203] [609]

[6] This is done at present, even after the carrying away of the "body." In former times it was omitted when the corpse was secretly buried by the nuesk. [178]

CHAPTER IX

RELATIONS WITH THE SUPERNATURAL

Introductory—Sterile Apparitions—Supernatural Aid Granted to the Unfortunate—Supernatural Good Luck—Shamanism—Direct Revelations from the Supreme God—Power Localized in Certain Spots—Dreams

INTRODUCTORY

THE aspects of Bella Coola life thus far described have been principally of a nature which might be experienced by any member of the community. On the other hand, contact with supernatural beings is a privilege granted to individuals without respect to rank; even a vulture appeal cannot assure it. The few to whom signal favours are granted acquire a position of importance totally different from that of chiefs. The Bella Coola are firmly convinced that supernatural beings abound in the mountains and forests of British Columbia, and that every activity of human life is governed by them. Not only do these creatures include monsters of the imagination, but birds, animals, and fish; even the activities of the human mind are considered to be beyond the scope of normal life. Ancient stories describing the actions of strange creatures and conversations between man and animals are accepted as truthful accounts, so that it seems obvious to the Bella Coola that his ancestors were more powerful than he is today. Never considering the possibility of errors in his stories, he accepts the alternative hypothesis that mankind has sadly degenerated from the golden age. Nevertheless, he assumes that the beings have not altered, and consequently hopes to encounter them on every occasion. Moreover, this firm background of belief makes it easy for him to recognize supernatural influence in events which a white man would consider to be natural. It is impossible to over-emphasize this concept.

755 to the part affected. In such a case the object, a toad for
* 756 example, becomes visible at the end of the staff. Conjuring is employed to do this, and often a tuft of dyed cedar-bark is used, which makes the deception still easier. Shamans are very expert in such matters. It is said that when two rival shamans once disputed about their prowess, one of them cast his stick on the ground and it became a snake, whereupon the other did likewise; and his became a toad which hopped after [177] the snake. The Bella Coola find biblical parallels for such revelations of power in the transformation of Aaron's rod, and the appearance of fire on Mount Carmel.

Shamanistic Ceremonies

●554 In addition to his professional abilities, a shaman has also
* 756 certain social prerogatives. As has been mentioned, many shamans lack the power to cure, but they may have seen some 787 feat during a dream, or during a visitation from Ṫlitcäplilän·a. It enhances a man's social prestige if he can graphically display whatever he has observed. It follows that the rites about to be described are often, perhaps usually, performed by a person unable to cure the sick, but it must be remembered that to the Bella Coola there is no social difference between a shaman who can cure with the aid of a basin, and one who lacks this power. Each has merely received a different gift from his supernatural benefactor. There seems little doubt that a man of imagina-
* 756 tive temperament frequently invents a feat of this type, or rather that he ponders over one until he either dreams of it, 787 or imagines himself to have done so. Certainly, after he has performed such a rite, he deludes himself into believing that he has had supernatural authorization for it. Conjuring feats performed long ago by shamans, feats practised by the members of other tribes, personal inventions, either actually or theoretically dreamed of, all these are among the sources from which shamanistic dances are derived. It follows that almost
* 756 anyone who has the necessary skill is able to perform, provided 556 that he has sufficient food to validate the ceremony. Thus this 754 members, and delegated the task to a man who was known to be skilled in such matters. The latter stole some shreds of the offender's clothing, placed them in a human skull which he fastened to a long rope and threw into a swift stretch of the river. As the rapids tossed the skull to and fro, the person whose clothing was within began to feel uneasy; first he experienced a jumping pain in his head, but as the wild movements continued, he became light-headed and finally delirious. At this juncture, it was decided to pull back the skull, but the rope broke and it was carried away downstream. Nothing could save the man and he died within a few hours. This particular incident occurred among the Bella Bella, but it is agreed that it might have happened in Bella Coola.

[554] The mingled fear of, and aversion to, a person who knows some such secret method of killing, fades into insignificance compared to the extreme loathing of every Bella Coola for sorcerers. Their methods of killing may be similar to the ones just described, but they are evil creatures who practise secretly, working entirely to gratify their own personal desires. Not [683] only is the murder of a sorcerer a virtuous act, but the relatives of one should be put to death without mercy. There is no single factor which has caused so much hatred, bitterness, and suspicion as belief in the activities of sorcerers. Conversion to [797] Christianity has scarcely altered it, and men who have been members of the church for ten to twenty years remain fully convinced that some of their associates have loathsome abilities as sorcerers. In many parts of the world, belief in black magic and witchcraft is one of the last native convictions to pass away, and it seems probable that this will be the case in Bella Coola although, of course, it will become increasingly difficult to obtain information about the subject.

The actual methods used by different sorcerers vary, although most of them require an article which has been in contact with their intended victim. Consequently, they seek pieces of soiled clothing, nail parings, hair clippings, spittle, and other objects of the same type which are usually concealed is spoken of in the Chinook jargon as a mesatche box, that is, a "dirty," "unclean," or "repulsive" box, and this term is one which is mentioned whenever an unexpected death takes place, or whenever a coastal Indian is accused of loitering around a deserted camp or of stealing into another's house. The belief is not limited to the Bella Coola, but has formed the basis for criminal cases all over the coast of British Columbia. It is difficult to find words sufficiently strong to express the disgust, loathing, and fear with which the Bella Coola regard a person suspected of sorcery.

Ability in this respect carries with it certain prohibitions. A sorcerer would lose his power if he should wash or blow his nose except when about to commit murder. The one old Bella Coola now thought to be a sorcerer never washes; he knows that if he did so, he would be immediately accused of plotting someone's death. This man is greatly feared, as he is said to have a collection of spittle from every member of the tribe; efforts have been made to break into his house and steal this, but it has never been found. He takes credit for the death of at least one white man in the valley. A peculiar impediment suffered by all sorcerers is a prohibition against turning around, although no one knows why doing so should deprive them of their strength. The explanation may be that their power would recoil upon themselves, a concept well illustrated by the following incident:

When the first Christian Bella Coola left the old village to settle near the mission station, they were regarded with dislike and suspicion by their fellow-tribesmen. One day, one of them happened to follow a path through the woods which led her to a rude shelter in which was a bundle. Hastily summoning her fellows, they opened it and found an article of clothing belonging to each Christian. The man who told this incident described his fear at finding a dirty shirt of his own among the others. They felt that the garments had been collected by a young man who claimed to be a shaman, but whom they suspected to be merely the accomplice of a sorcerer, and this was soon proved to be the case. He was insufficiently trained; instead of touching the patient's body with his stick, he used to suck wherever the pain was located and then tense throughout this chapter, and to assume the presence of a number of young men and women ignorant of the significance of the rites. Formerly, the kukusiut often had difficulty in impressing the uninitiated with their prowess, and feuds with the a'alk were common.

Although membership in the kusiut society depends on an ancestral prerogative, it is essentially a democratic institution. A certain amount of wealth is necessary to validate a kusiut prerogative, but nothing comparable to that required for a potlatch; in fact, poor men are often persons of great importance within the ranks of the society. Nor are the prerogatives considered to be as valuable as ancestral rights, so that slaves are often admitted as kukusiut by their masters. An important kusiut is not esteemed by the community in the same way as the donor of many potlatches; in short, membership in the society brings limited ceremonial and semi-religious advantage, not social prestige of a public nature.

Powers and Functions of the Society

Any secret society can be viewed from the standpoints of a member, and of a non-member. The scope of the kusiut organization can be most clearly outlined by describing first what an uninitiated person knows about it. From his infancy, parents impress upon a child the supernatural powers of the kukusiut and the dangers attached to their rites. Such instruction is perhaps strongest where one, or both, is not a member. They then voice their own fears, and do not merely deceive for the good of the society. Steeped as every child is in a firm belief of the near presence of the supernatural, he readily believes what he is told. He learns, for example, that if, without special invitation, he dares enter the house where a kusiut dance is taking place—at any time during the four days or more that it lasts—his spirit will be drawn from him. This is sufficient to deter him from prying too closely into the rites. Strangely enough, there seem always to have been differences in teaching with respect to this deception. It is believed that if a non-

*575 more difficult dramatic rites in which failure would lead to the 796 uninitiated learning the mysteries of the society, the matter is 424 debated at length. The writer was present at one meeting held for this purpose, with regard to a performance which had not been carried out for over thirty years. An air of solemnity was evident throughout, as if each present realized the gravity of the topic. The prospective dancer explained what he wished to do, then anyone was at liberty to comment, and most of those present took advantage of it, the marshals speaking last of all. The influence of each speaker depended in part on the [554] type of kusiut dance which he himself had given, and in part on his general status in the community as chief or otherwise, an intangible position dependent on public estimation rather than upon functional rights. In this case, after considerable discussion, it was decided that the dancer could proceed with his arrangements. But if there should be any doubt as to the would-be performer's ability, the marshals have no hesitation in prohibiting his intended rite, and they often do so later if rehearsals show that it is unlikely to be successful.

Refusal of permission to perform occurs only in case of the more difficult dances, which include the Cannibal, Scratch, Breaker, Fungus and Kusiotem. Members of the society whose prerogatives are for one of these types are considered as having greater importance than those who can merely sing of some minor deity-patron; yet all are equally members of the kusiut society, which is not graded according to the performances of its members.

*575 Many of the more difficult dances require weeks of pre-796 paration, when it is sometimes said that the dancer has disappeared to the land above. When he returns they usually conclude in four nights, the time taken by those of a simpler [104] type. Each of these nights[1] is known by an untranslatable term, and, as it will be necessary to use these throughout, it may assist the reader to summarize the ritual which takes place on each. It can be assumed that it is a simple dance, that is, one without elaborate preliminaries.

forth, followed by a number of kukusiut who remain constantly in attendance on him. 575* 796*

X enters the lowest house and sits down near the door, too heavy, with the weight of the crystals, to proceed further. He growls persistently, while the kukusiut women present drone monotonously, and those who have accompanied him utter their cry of hoip. These measures at last persuade the Cannibal to move, but only to the next house, where the same procedure is repeated, and so for each in the village. The uninitiated peer curiously and fearfully from their bedrooms, but would never dream of joining in the cry of hoip. If X should be asleep or otherwise engaged when the voices are heard, some of his assistants awaken him and send him forth. The arrival of strangers also excites X. One of his followers tells him of their coming and when a canoe reaches the river, he runs down into the water and bites as many of the newcomers as he desires. The herald, watching the approach of the strangers and knowing what will happen, cries out to the uninitiated to conceal themselves prior to X's appearance. The guests proceed to the dwelling of their host, but that evening the Cannibal's father, or whoever acts for him, calls them to his house where he gives them presents to validate the biting. If foreigners have been expected, gifts are always saved for them from the previous distribution. The value of the present depends in part on the rank of the recipient, but more upon the feeling of like or dislike with which X's father regards him. A chief naturally receives more than a person of lower rank, although these donations are not returned. 575* 796* 431 [609] [554]

On the morning of the fifth day of X's retirement, some of the kukusiut collect chamber-pots and towards noon he is immersed in the river in the manner previously described. Then he goes through the village four times, on each round visiting every house. The uninitiated are told that the washing has caused his call to depart, and the whistle is heard no more.[a] 575* 796*

Towards dusk all the kukusiut assemble in X's house. He

[a] The dismissal of the call at this time may not be the correct procedure.

[The Scratch Dance]

* 575 They do not blacken their faces on receipt of a call as do 424 most kukusiut.

[302] The theme of their songs is of the land above, instead solely [787] of their patrons.

[533] On visiting a house where a qulem or nakuam is taking place they sit with the Cannibals in one of the back corners; this group is given food before any of the other guests.

They do not exercise their prerogative on fellow-Scratchers, Cannibals, or Breakers.

[787] They are liable to frenzy both when the call is upon them and after its departure. In such cases they run forth, apparently guarded and restrained by other kukusiut, and rush into every house to frighten the uninitiated.

They must recompense those whom they have scratched.

[578] They act as peace-makers among the kukusiut, since the necessity of accompanying a Scratcher who pretends to be frenzied overrules all petty causes of strife.

[554] Though any definite concept of graded rank in the kusiut society is quite foreign to the Bella Coola, it is generally felt that Scratchers and Breakers are only slightly less important than Cannibals. The patron of every Scratcher is Sno'olxdis
[776] Alquntām, one of the sons of Alquntām; this supernatural being scratches the supernatural ones in the land above, and his father alone can restrain him. The prerogative is fairly common, and it is probable that in early days there was at least one Scratcher in every village.

* 575 The following account of the ritual was obtained from one
* 796 of the Bella Coola marshals and describes the manner in which the dance should have been performed by the Scratcher, [424] Alushnaix, his daughter's daughter's son, who had recently obtained the prerogative formerly possessed by his deceased mother's father. It will be convenient to refer to Alushnaix as X and use the present tense in recording the proper ritual, though it was largely omitted on the last occasion the dance was given.

X arranges a suitable day with the marshals for receiving

obey one prohibition; he must not sleep with his wife for four days. 575* 746*

Like a Cannibal, X is liable to frenzy for the rest of the ceremonial season. During this period he remains secluded within his house, and the uninitiated willingly avoid him, believing him to be mentally deranged. He attends every kusiut dance, where his latent madness helps to frighten the uninitiated. If strangers from Kimsquit or Tal'ia visit Bella Coola, he at once becomes frenzied, rushes to the beach and scratches them, precisely as a Cannibal would do; in this case he must be pacified in the same manner. A Scratcher always owns goods to recompense scratched foreigners. If it is the first time that X has danced, he must remain secluded for the following summer, and give his ceremony the next winter. During the warm months he remains within the back room of his house, and through some of the uninitiated know of his presence, still believing him mad they do not intrude upon his privacy. The coming of foreigners during this period excites him to frenzy and he scratches them, irrespective of the time of year. [834] [828]

It might be mentioned that some Scratcher names are indicative of the dancer's function, and others, such as "The Cause of Fear," have reference to his prowess. [551]

THE BREAKER DANCE

When a Bella Coola speaks of the fear which kusiut dances cause the uninitiated, he almost invariably cites in order the Cannibal, Scratch, and Breaker dances. Kukusiut with these three prerogatives have no more privileges than other members of the society, nor are they considered superior in rank; but similarity in their functions leads to an almost automatic association. If questioned further, a Bella Coola will usually say that he regards the Cannibal dance to be first, with the Scratch and Breaker equal, but less important. Breakers share with Cannibals and Scratchers the prerogatives of not blackening their faces; of having as theme for their songs the land 575* 746* 424 [781] [554] [302] [533] [264]

* 575 * 796 [424] feats. X is one of the few ʔukaciat having the prerogative of using supernatural singers. The evening's ceremony concludes in the usual fashion.

Until the departure of his call, X is liable to fits of frenzy so that on both qulaw and nakcaw he often visits every house and breaks utensils, though his guardians appear to be making every effort to restrain him. Breakers, irrespective of their [424] exact prerogative, are enabled to act in any unusual manner they desire, and strive to excel in peculiar behaviour. A favourite trick is to smear themselves with excrement, either real or imitation. It is difficult to over-estimate the enormous [554] prestige which such actions call forth in the eyes of the uninitiated, to whom it appears that the coming of a call entirely [787] alters the mentality of the recipient, a belief which the ʔukaciat [828] make every effort to maintain. Nothing further need be said of either qulaw or the predilections of nakcaw, both of which follow the usual pattern.

* 575 * 796 781 When the uninitiated are admitted to X's house on nakcaw evening, they are filled with wonder at the sight of the masked singers, of Xwalqwalit Alqantēn, and of the four supernatural Breakers who move wildly to and fro as the songs are sung, as if only the eagle down which the ʔukaciat blow upon them restrains them from destroying property. The fluent Awʔikwalxaix makes the most of her opportunity to describe the wonders which are before their eyes. Then the uninitiated are told that it will be safer for them to withdraw, and hurry out. Presently they are startled to hear the sound of people moving, and the four supernatural Breakers, followed by all the ʔukaciat, leave the house and proceed to the lowest one in the village. Around the fire go the masked four, picking up stones and hurling them at any destructible property. Most [252] houses contain a number of stones which have been used in [578] boiling liquids, so that there is no lack of missiles. ʔukaciat [615] who are wise take care to hide or remove valuable property before this inroad begins, since the wearers of the masks take advantage of the opportunity to destroy the goods of those 126 195 533 text, although they are obvious on the phonograph records. In singing, moreover, sounds, especially vowel sounds, are altered to fit the tune, a factor which accounts for further discrepancies between record and text. A frequent device is reduplication, a word or group of words is repeated in singing when not called for in the spoken version. Finally one sound occurs in singing which is practically unknown in speaking, a velar s (recorded as s) which gives a whistling effect. Most choruses and some whole songs consist of meaningless sounds; in such cases the tune alone is important and no attempt was made to record the syllables.

It was quite as difficult to obtain interpretations as to record texts. Songs which have been handed down for generations abound in archaic expressions which are meaningless even to the older men; some recently composed are full of metaphorical devices to conceal their real significance from the uninitiated. The result is consequently a series of words which, taken one at a time, convey no meaning. In many cases it was impossible to obtain literal translations, even with the willing assistance of younger men familiar with English. Every effort was made to get the general meaning, and it is felt that this object was tolerably achieved, though the transcriptions may not be sufficiently accurate for grammatical analysis.

533 796 575 554 424 555 Singers function at every ceremony; in fact, its success depends so largely upon their efforts that they are always important members of the community. Some singers are created by the validation of an ancestral prerogative; others by having composed a suitable tune. The young man who has done so, calls one of the established musicians aside and hums it to him; if the hearer is favourably impressed, he may learn and repeat it to his fellows, and if it wins their approval, the composer may be asked to join their ranks for the occasion on which it is to be used. Thus encouraged, the young man is likely to try again, or he may be invited to assist at some ceremony for which a large number of singers is required. If proficient, he is certain to win recognition in course of time,

C The third part, if it ever existed, has been forgotten.

(a) This differs from most Sisyutlum songs in that Sum was an unmarried mother, not a faithless wife. She was held up to scorn by the men of Kimsquit and this song composed for her by a certain Sisyutlum. [848]

(b) Recorded as song VII D 38a, National Museum of Canada; singer, Jim Pollard.

(c) It is said that women, even of slave blood, used to endeavour to increase their importance in the eyes of their children by lamenting, falsely, of ancestral history. [554]

(d) A term of opprobrium, difficult to translate. It is said to imply slave ancestry, but is more probably a mere epithet, referring to the female organ. [195]

(e) This is addressed to women in general.

(f) An expression of pain or sorrow, used under all circumstances. [192]

(g) The theme is here changed as if it were Sum herself speaking. This is a common device in all kinds of songs.

(h) Qolsti was supposed to be the father of Sum's child.

Mourning Songs

Mourning songs excel all other Bella Coola compositions in length, complexity, and wealth of detail. Especially those composed for mighty chiefs contain numerous references to the ancestral history of the deceased and mention incidents referred to in origin myths, a source of pride to the survivors and of envy to those who listen. 599* [765] [766]

B 721 these accounts seemed to be exaggerations, and the casualties were probably few. The Bella Coola did not have the same [554] admiration for the successful warrior as for the man who gave many potlatches, while everything indicates that their raids B [703] were on a small scale, rendered singularly ineffective by lack of discipline.

Specific Accounts

Active warfare has been so long discontinued on the coast that none of the living Bella Coola can describe conditions as they existed during hostilities. It was possible to collect the following accounts of raids and adventures which, though individually of small value, illustrate tactics and strategy, and recount incidents which throw light on the frame of mind of the participants.

Kitkatla War

For many years there was animosity between the Bella Coola and the Kitkatla who, with the advantage of strong government, used to swoop down from the north for salmon and slaves. Bella Coola itself was comparatively immune from attack, but the Kimsquit people suffered severely. The attackers were not always successful; one old man related how, when his mother's mother was an infant, they were driven off with the loss of four canoes and many men. The fact that this B incident had been remembered for so many years indicates that T it was unusual.

Slaves captured in this way were traded from tribe to tribe and rarely escaped. When an elderly Bella Coola was a lad, there was considerable excitement in the community owing to the return of Sluhmala, a woman who had been carried off when a girl. She had been traded to a northern tribe among whom, she said, it was customary to crush captives beneath totem-poles and house-posts. Her diligence saved her from this fate, and she was passed on until she reached the far north, on the Tsakoo remained encamped for several days, during which time he sent word to the Bella Coola that he regretted the death of Sekwalitat and had come to make peace. He added that his followers had tried to dissuade him, saying that he would be killed, but he had answered that he was too great a man to allow fear to influence his actions.

Having waited for several days, the party came up the Bella Coola River, their canoe loaded with presents and eagle down, while Tsakoo's brother, Sisaiks, wore the mask of his ancestors as further proof of friendly intentions. It was unusual to display one escape to a rival community, but this was an unprecedented event; to have that he might soon be killed and he preferred to die while bearing the obvious mark of incorporation with some incident of an unusual myth. The canoe was beached opposite the house of Pielo where the crew blew eagle down into the air to mark their peaceful mission. Men had gathered from all parts of the Bella Coola valley and several hot-heads wished to disregard the safe-conduct and slay their enemies, a course which they had recommended for several days and had tried to precipitate by cross-acts against the Kitlacla. Pielo himself had not spoken, but he now appeared and advised the people not to harm Tsakoo, since continuing hostility would result. Though his wishes did not entirely quiet the angry ones, they outwardly assured the Kitlacla of a welcome. Pielo brought forward a mountain-skin, and told some of his people to hold it spread as then, when Tsakoo leaps from his canoe, he would land upon it, and could be carried to the house without putting foot to the ground. Tsakoo expressed gratitude that there was nothing on earth strong enough to support him, since his many protection had made him incomparably heavy. Since the hon, he occupied the honour, an assurance to landing shown only to mighty chiefs, and was carried into the house where he was seated in the far right-hand corner, an honourable location. Pielo invited all the people in the vicinity, shown as well as Bella Coola, and the inner partitions of the house had to be removed to provide space for the dining.

Though Pielo had decided against the immediate killing of the Kitlacla, he had concocted a scheme to test their bravery and the sincerity of their desire for peace. No one knew of this except his nephew, Sisaiks, who was to carry it out. When all were seated, the latter appeared, his face smeared with ochre, and his hair tied up in a top-knot with eagle down as is customary during war. Sisaiks moved surreptitiously around the house, brandishing a weapon and repeatedly pointing it at Tsakoo in a threatening manner. If the Kitlacla had shown nervousness, particularly if one of them had fled his own weapon, a massacre would have resulted. But they remained unmoved, confident in the prestige of their leader, while he knew that though his body might be in former times. Skiu might almost be called the Bella Coola national game, although it is now (1923) seldom played. 526 [172]

A game with somewhat similar rules is squelaxit, played with small wooden spears tipped with bone. When a number of men or boys decide to play, they choose two captains who in turn select their teams; any number can take part, provided that the sides are equal, but five each is usual. There is a special name for each player according to his position, and he bets against the corresponding number of the other team. A mark is set up, and one of the captains throws his spear, so that it will stick upright in the ground as near the target as possible. The rival leader endeavours to beat this, and if he fails, his second man throws, and each in succession until one comes closer to the goal than the rival captain. Then the loser's number two tries to beat the last thrower, followed by those on his own side until one succeeds or till all have thrown. The game then ends when all of one side have thrown unsuccessfully. The winning side is, of course, the one to which belongs the player whose throw is nearest the target. Each member of the losing team pays his wager to his adversary and a second round is begun. 526 525

The sport is now rarely indulged in, but in former times games used to continue all day, and valuables were lost in the gambling which was considered to be a necessary part of it. [785] Men used to observe ceremonial chastity to increase their [354] chances of success and the expert was regarded with admiration by younger lads. The crack team of a village often used to [628] visit other towns to compete against their representatives, and the games were continued amid frenzied excitement on the part of the supporters. This occasionally led to serious fighting. [578]

Another sport of a similar type is archery; a mark is set up and each competitor tries to lodge his arrow as close to it as possible. This game has now entirely lost favour, the young men preferring a type of football played without strict attention to rules, but with great energy. 526

713 around her head, wrists, and ankles; her face was blackened, her hair
716 strewn with eagle-down. She commanded the woman to dance in the same way as she saw her dancing. The people should accompany her dance with songs, and, after she had finished, they should dance with masks. She said, 'Whenever a person sees me your people shall dance the Kû'siût. If you do not do so I shall punish you with death and sickness. In summer, while I am in my house, you must not dance the Kû'siût.'

575 Ever since that time the Bilqula dance the Kû'siût. When a man has 716 seen Anânlikûtsai'n sitting before her cave he will invite the people to a Kû'siût. A ring made of red and white cedar-bark is hung up in his house, and the uninitiated are not allowed to enter it. Only in the evening, when dances are performed, they may look on, standing close to the door. As soon as the dances are over they must retire from the taboo house. Each Kû'siût lasts three days.

535 The various dances performed by members of the Kû'siût are also the 575 property of the gentes, and the right of performing them is restricted
614 to members of the gens. They must not be given to a daughter's husband, 424 as is the case with the Sisau'kn dances (see above), but belong to the members of the gens alone. They may, however, be loaned and borrowed
[424] by members of the gens, who have a right to a particular dance, but who do not own it. Permission to use a mask or dance is obtained from the owner by payments. The owner may reclaim the dance or the borrower 575 may return it at any time. Membership of the Kû'siût is obtained through an initiation. At this time the novice is given his Kû'siût name, which [551] he retains throughout life. Each gens has its peculiar Kû'siût names,
[428] which are inherited by young persons from their parents or from other relatives. Thus a young man who had the name of Pô'pô until he was about seventeen years old obtained at his initiation the name of Ti'akô'etl. I have not reached a very clear understanding of the details of the initia-
[556] tion; it seems that the dance is simply given to the novice in the same way as the Sisau'kn, this initiation being connected with a potlatch. But [787] still it seems possible that he must 'dream' of the dance which he is to perform. Only the highest degrees of the Kû'siût have to pass through a religious ceremony of some importance. The highest degrees are the

575 When the tlaqô'tla is initiated he goes into the forest, where he 785 encounters his guardian spirit. It is believed that he goes up to the sun, and formerly he had to take human flesh along for food. The chiefs held
[244] killed, in order to serve as food for the tlaqô'tla. The offer was accepted and a payment of from ten to twenty blankets made for the slave. The latter was killed, and the members of the tlaqô'tla order devoured one-half of the body before the departure of the novice to the woods. There the latter is tied up and left to fast. He may stay there for twenty or thirty days until the spirit appears to him and takes him up to the sun,
575 where he is initiated. Early one morning he returns, and is heard outside the houses. He has lost all his hair, which, it is believed, has been torn

431 child of a mixed Bella Coola and slave marriage. As long as 567 such an one maintained a position of importance in the com-578 munity by the distribution of presents, nothing was said, but if he should fail to do so, he could be, and frequently was, [554] insulted by having references made to his ancestry. In case of dispute or rivalry it was always a temptation to refer to such a blot, but if he had atoned for it with presents, references were considered improper. Unquestionably, memory of slave 554 ancestry was forgotten in course of time if the line was influ-567 ential, although recollections of the stigma were always carried for at least two or three generations. At the present time the most influential woman in Bella Coola, the one who has given most presents, is the granddaughter of a Smith Inlet slave. This man had lived in Bella Coola for many years and had married another slave, by whom he had a son. The latter became the husband of an influential Stuix woman. When she became pregnant, her family secured the liberation of her husband, and gave many presents to "wash the child." One daughter was born to this couple, the woman just mentioned.
Her mother's relatives were influential, and her father was [555] such an expert canoe-maker that he was able to win an honourable position for his daughter by presents of his handicraft.
The woman, possessed of considerable ability herself, has been able to give many ceremonies and so reach a position of eminence. No one dares insult her by mentioning her ancestry, but everyone knows about it and if her children should fail to hold their position, they would be open to insult on this score.
The woman has validated names and myths derived both from her mother and father, without explaining how the Smith Inlet traditions came to Bella Coola.

To sum up, it may be said that the position of slaves in Bella Coola was not particularly onerous, though it depended entirely on the will of their masters. Without status in the community, a slave could have been abused by a cruel owner, [182] though the public life of the village, where all lived and ate together, tended to break down the unsystematically enforced differences of rank.

701 than that of anyone else. The Bella Coola do not rationalize
156 in a scientific manner; if a man holds a belief firmly, he acts on it without questioning its logic. Moreover, if a professional warrior functions a number of times, this in itself is enough to strengthen his conviction that he must act henceforth in the same way. It can be said with confidence that the owner of [463] a professional prerogative has considerable belief in his own powers, that this acts on himself to render him proficient, and that the majority of the community have respect for his capabilities.

THE PROFESSION OF SINGER

533 either through natural ability or an ancestral prerogative. There is a constant need for men able to sing and compose [463] songs for every kind of ceremonial, so a young man of talent has little difficulty in gaining admittance to the choir. He may even win great distinction and become recognized as the leading authority on musical matters. None the less, his success is considered to be accidental and unsubstantial, lacking the foundation that comes from the possession of a duly validated professional prerogative. A person made a singer by the latter means may be entirely unable to compose; in this case he is not a member of the choir, although he enjoys the social distinction which he has won by distributing goods to confirm his professional name. The singer most respected is he who combines with natural ability a confirmed prerogative to give substance and power to his position and composi-
[553] tions. At the death of such an one, an effort is always made [428] by the members of his ancestral family to transmit the name to a youth who has shown musical promise. Arguments and [578] differences of opinion are common among the members of the choir and in such cases the self-assurance and influence of a man whose position has been made strong by the distribution of presents often outweighs that of one who can rely only on his actual ability.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

THE PROFESSION OF CARPENTER

As with singers, there are many carpenters who ply their trade without the advantage of an ancestral prerogative. They, also, may be expert and receive credit for their skill, but they can never achieve quite the distinction that comes to a man who has been made a carpenter by the distribution of presents. The latter may be so clumsy with tools that no one would ever trust him to make a canoe, or even a mask; but he is, socially, a carpenter, whereas a skilled artisan lacking a prerogative is admired for his ability but has no foundation of social esteem. In transmitting a professional carpenter's name, however, an effort is always made to give it to a youth with a bent in that direction.

The most esteemed carpenters are those who can make canoes, a trade which requires no special prerogative. In the beginning of time, Yulätimut was the canoe-maker par excellence; he assisted many of the first people, and no one can have a professional prerogative as carpenter unless this supernatural being appears in his ancestral myth. The Bella Coola ascribe the skill of the Bella Bella in carpentry to the fact that Yulätimut married a Bella Bella woman in the early period of the world and that many of that tribe are his descendants. In the old days, before the coming of the white men, carpenters were always respected as esteemed members of the community. Chiefs always cared for them, and they received abundant food at every ceremonial. None the less, they were not wealthy, and only in recent years, since the Bella Coola have realized the value put upon good craftsmanship by the white men, has it become customary to give valuable presents to carpenters. Ceremonially, they have considerable influence, since the carpenter who makes a mask usually decides who shall wear it and takes charge of the fitting and adjustment. He is also held responsible for any accident such as its falling when in use or for mechanical defects.

THE PROFESSION OF HUNTER

224 424 [463] Another profession which is entered by means of an ancestral prerogative is that of hunting. Many Bella Coola have validated their right to this vocation, some by confirming names created by their early ancestors, others by legalizing those brought down from above in the beginning of time. [551] One of the latter is Lalaimkila, "The Brusher Off," so-called because the owner is such a successful hunter that he can sweep mountain goats from the mountains as easily as an ordinary person can brush insects from a wall. Unlike the professions of carpenter and singer, it is believed that legalization of a hunter's name always brings success to the holder; [555] perhaps because everyone is more or less successful, it follows that whatever good fortune is achieved by a professional hunter [556] can be attributed to the validation of his prerogative. Others, lacking this assistance, may be proficient, but their success never carries with it the social prestige gained by a man who has distributed goods to substantiate the prerogative.

224 424 184 [177] There is a difference of opinion among the Bella Coola as to whether or not certain hunting methods are inheritable prerogatives. With the introduction of rifles, these have long been discontinued, and no definite information was obtained regarding the social position of their users. Several of the older men believed that the contrivances depended upon ancestral prerogatives, whereas others stated that they were merely individual discoveries which could have been, and in many cases were, imitated by anyone. It seems probable that most of the following practices are prerogatives, although it may be that they are no more than special hunting devices suitable only in certain areas and, therefore, limited to the members of the ancestral family owning that particular locality.

223 424 The method about which the most definite information was obtained, was one formerly employed by a certain Nazpalqiq to catch geese at Tāl-ie. According to one elderly Bella Coola, expenditure though he must forgo the prestige enjoyed by a man who has been able to elevate his professional names in a lavish manner. Selection is a constant factor in the social life of a Bella Coola; the man who uses all his wealth to acquire a firm seat cannot be "strong" in ssaok matters; the man who desires to specialize in kusiut affairs cannot afford to display an elaborate totem-pole. Amid these conflicting desires, it often happens that a man somewhat neglects his professional prerogatives, especially those of which the dignity has been slightly lessened through superior skill shown by individuals endowed with no more than native ability. Upstarts of this kind have always infringed upon professional dignity, and the coming of the white man has added a new factor which has almost destroyed vocational prerogatives.

A'alk Dances

The most important, as well as the most spectacular, dances that occur at potlatches are those given by members of the ssaok society. In addition to these, a feature of many potlatches is the performance of a'alk dances.[1] As already mentioned, from 1870 onwards there have been many changes in ssaok ritual; new elements have been acquired by the marriages of Bella Coola to members of the coastal tribes, with the result that details of procedure vary at every ceremony according to the prerogatives of the donor. Since 1910, the influence of white civilization has increased to such an extent that ssaok ceremonials have virtually been abandoned. This took place at a time when the ritual was in transition, a state of affairs which rendered difficult the collection of coherent information. A'alk dances are associated with ssaok, but the addition of new features to the latter was accompanied by a decay of the former. Both societies have now almost ceased to exist, but whereas the ssaok organization was abandoned during a period of change and accretion, that 126 text, although they are obvious on the phonograph records.

195 In singing, moreover, sounds, especially vowel sounds, are altered to fit the tune, a factor which accounts for further
*533 discrepancies between record and text. A frequent device is reduplication, a word or group of words is repeated in singing when not called for in the spoken version. Finally one sound occurs in singing which is practically unknown in speaking, a velar s (recorded as ʃ) which gives a whistling effect. Most choruses and some whole songs consist of meaningless sounds; in such cases the tune alone is important and no attempt was made to record the syllables.

It was quite as difficult to obtain interpretations as to record texts. Songs which have been handed down for generations abound in archaic expressions which are meaningless even to the older men: some recently composed are full of metaphorical devices to conceal their real significance from the uninitiated. The result is consequently a series of words which, taken one at a time, convey no meaning. In many cases it was impossible to obtain literal translations, even with the willing assistance of younger men familiar with English. Every effort was made to get the general meaning, and it is felt that this object was tolerably achieved, though the transcriptions may not be sufficiently accurate for grammatical analysis.

*533 Singers function at every ceremony; in fact, its success
*796 depends so largely upon their efforts that they are always
575 important members of the community. Some singers are created by the validation of an ancestral prerogative; others [554] by having composed a suitable tune. The young man who has [424] done so, calls one of the established musicians aside and hums [555] it to him; if the hearer is favourably impressed, he may learn and repeat it to his fellows, and if it wins their approval, the composer may be asked to join their ranks for the occasion on which it is to be used. Thus encouraged, the young man is likely to try again, or he may be invited to assist at some ceremony for which a large number of singers is required. If proficient, he is certain to win recognition in course of time, until it is accepted by all that he is one of the men who should be called upon to take part in all rites. If possible, he endeavours to legalize his position by a distribution of presents. Men are always eager to become singers, both for fame and for emoluments. 533 796* 575* [555] [424]

New songs are required every year for sisaok and kusiut dances, necessitating an almost limitless number of compositions. Singers frequently make use of fragments of old tunes, or snatches from half-forgotten songs, but they are ridiculed as inefficient if the plagiarism be too obvious. Tunes are always prepared in advance; in fact, proficient composers spend much of their time at all seasons of the year in humming over to themselves possible combinations. When word is passed around that a song is required, they meet in some lonely spot and each who has one in readiness hums it, tapping a gentle accompaniment. After considerable discussion, one is selected as being the most suitable and the singers make themselves familiar with it. Words are then put to it, consisting of fragments from the ancestral myth of the person for whom it has been prepared, or from some other theme appropriate to the occasion. Sometimes this is done by the composer of the tune; sometimes by another singer more familiar with the subject. The provision of words is considered less difficult and less important than the composition of a tune; no one knows the source of inspiration for the latter, but the former is said to come from either the heart or the head. All ceremonial songs are divided into three sections; kelulo·s or first part, ăs·iko·tl or second part, and ălox or third part, separated from one another by the siutnălos, wordless chorus. The three parts correspond, approximately, to verses and each contains four, rarely six, subdivisions. In mourning songs there are sometimes as many as six or eight ălox, and the whole is correspondingly lengthened.

On the night of a ceremony, the singers always take their places beforehand for a final rehearsal. Each brings his own beating-stick, a stout baton about two feet long to pound on the floor in time with his singing. The only other musical [534] quantities of ducks and geese, and the inhabitants of the inland villages sometimes made hunting expeditions to the nesting places of wild-fowl in the lakes of the interior uplands. Although numbers of birds were sometimes killed in this way, they were never a steady article of diet. The same is true of geese. Always plentiful, these birds were commonly killed, but never in large numbers. 223 [136] [262]

The basis of the food supply was fish. The river teemed with salmon, which enabled the country to support its relatively large population. Spring, sockeye, hump-back, dog, and coho salmon, all entered the river in thousands during the spring and summer, while the steel-head could be caught throughout the year. They were taken in weirs and their flesh smoked for winter use. Throughout the year, salmon was the principal article of diet. Second in importance was the olachen, a fish somewhat resembling a herring, which entered the river in great numbers during April or May. They were taken in purse-like nets,* allowed to rot for ten days or two weeks, and then boiled. The grease was skimmed off and kept indefinitely to be used as a relish for other foods. It was always a sign of poverty if a person were obliged to eat berries without olachen grease. Trout and bull-heads were found in the river, but were not sufficiently plentiful to be of importance. 226 262 [251] [252] [263] [237] [735] [556]

Although no form of agriculture was practised, the Bella Coola used vegetable food to a considerable extent. Berries were abundant; some were eaten raw, but many more were pounded into a pulpy mass and dried in the sun. Cakes prepared in this way kept indefinitely and formed one of the regular winter foods. The bark of the hemlock and cottonwood was eaten, as well as the roots of many plants. In recent years many of these have not been used, so that an investigator is apt to overlook their great importance in early times. Although useless for food, the cedar was the corner-stone of Bella Coola material culture. From its trunk were split out, with wedges, the wide planks which formed 262 [241] [251] [178] 824 322

000 Coola throw pieces of it and eagle down on the water.

424 Before leaving the subject of supernatural animals, a word 773 must be said concerning the attitude of the Bella Coola to 825 those in whose forms their first ancestors came to earth. If, for example, a man's first ancestor descended as a raven, this knowledge is a valuable possession of himself and his family.
[559] Indeed, the most treasured possessions of a Bella Coola are not the material objects collected by him through life, but the intangible rights wrapped up in his ancestral history. These are referred to under four names:

(1) Smaiuste, "Preserved Story"; the myth describing the coming to earth of a man's first ancestors in the beginning of time.

(2) Kelaka, "What Was Sent Down"; the names and other possessions given by Alqantăm to a man's first ancestors in the beginning of time.

(3) Tsămăl, "Whence We Came"; the place to which a man's first ancestors came in the beginning of time, and the one from which they have since spread.

(4) Qwathuta.

Various smaiuste are recorded in vol. I, chap. vi, and the second and third terms are really part of the first, although to the Bella Coola they are psychologically distinct. Qwathuta is the word used for both the birds or animals chosen as cloaks by the first settlers, and also for creatures with which the early people came in contact. The nearest interpretation 424 appears to be, "Crest." When a Bella Coola whose first an-773 cestor came to earth as a raven portrays that bird, it serves as 825 a visible mark of his intangible possession. In former days, 211 if a man carved on stone so that his work and his name would never be forgotten, it was a qwathuta, a constant reminder of his greatness to generations then unborn. A qwathuta, therefore, combines the concept of memorial with that of crest, so that Bella Coola speak of the white man's memorials as qwathuta. In brief, a man regards the form assumed by his ancestor when coming to this earth as an emblem of the

424 exact answer to the question replied that his crest was the 999 Raven. The Kitkatla was a Raven man, too, and to the 825 narrator's surprise, treated him as a brother for the rest of his stay in Victoria. He shook with laughter as he recalled the experience, and added that though he was quite willing to accept favours of this kind he would never dream of returning them. It can be stated unhesitatingly that the Bella Coola have no totemic beliefs concerning their crests. There is not [582] the slightest trace of respect towards the animal, nor yet of sanctity.

211 Although crests are not objects of religious veneration, yet 424 they have some importance in the realm of social life. The 993 portrayal of one serves to indicate ownership of an ancestral myth describing that particular bird or animal. A wealthy 825 chief is proud to display his crest on a totem-pole, or as a painting on the front wall of his house. Anyone seeing such a [532] design is impressed with the glorious of the family history of [550] the owner, to the latter's gratification. A living specimen of the bird or animal is treated with no respect, but its delineation is a memento of family history. For that reason a man
[890] family history, his most treasured possession. It is said, half

[191] [184] *This is said that tattooing was formerly customary not only among all the coastal tribes but also the Carriers. Both Bella Coola men and women decorated themselves in this way, but the custom was not universal, and is said never to have been common. It is believed that Haida chiefs tattooed themselves in connection with potlatches; in Bella Coola this was not the case although the operation was performed within the back room of the patient's house. Two methods were employed. The first was by puncturing the skin with a needle covered with colouring material, the second and less common, by passing a string coated with the substance beneath the skin. The dye was obtained from river stones which were boiled for a long time and then ground into a powder. This began indefinitely and was by much easier for men but making with women. As far as could be learned, any skilled craftsman might perform the operation.

of thought, of success and failure and of life itself, to powers of another sphere. Their ideas are not clearly crystallized on this subject, but in the following section an attempt has been made to give a fair picture, gleaned from many informants, of the supernatural parts of the human body.

THE SPIRIT

The most important part of the human body is the sucúmlis, spirit. This is small, but of great power, since it belongs to the world of the supernatural; in fact, the spirit of a man is not mortal, but ciut. Everyone, man or woman, rich or poor, chief or slave, has one; without it, life would be impossible. When a child is born, his parents supply him with food and care, and Hyamtsin provides the even more necessary invisible elements, including the spirit. It resides in the back of the neck and resembles a thin bone shaped like a maple-leaf. Animals have similar ones, but with them the bone is visible, whereas only shamans can see it in human beings. The spirit is a new-born infant in weak and powerless, but it increases in strength with the body. If a man prospers in his ventures and has success in life, it is due, not to his own efforts, but to the activity of his spirit. When a man acquires wealth with little labour, he knows that his spirit has been constantly tumbling on the back of his neck; when he is unfortunate, that it has become sore or sluggish. It is the cause of dreams, which are desired as means of foretelling the future. Some Bella Coola believe that in sleep it leaves the body and travels, unrestrained by any barrier, to the scene of the dreams; others, that it causes the images to appear. During waking hours the spirit formulates every thought, no matter how trifling. When a man remembers that he left his fire with insufficient fuel and hurries home to rectify the omission, it is this element which has brought the need to his mind; when he thinks of a dance given, his spirit is responsible for the thought and some men even believe that it has travelled there. Sometimes an action one can give warning, as in the following instance. A few child one of his own names, in which case the donor surrenders all claim to it. This designation is the obvious mark of the position of the child in the ancestral family. Without such a formal conferring of an ancestral name an infant would be without status in the community, but, as children are always welcome, some relative is invariably ready to confirm the bestowal by the necessary distribution of goods, a feature that is present in every Bella Coola ceremonial. On such occasions the guests are called by their ancestral names. An effort was made to learn what would happen if the number of children born into an ancestral family exceeded the number of ancestral names enumerated in the origin myth, but no answer was forthcoming. Established custom demands that a name be provided for every child, and one is always provided. Without question designations must be invented, usually from some event in the origin myth, but it is always claimed that such were used by a long-deceased ancestor. In fact, the social custom agrees with the requirements of the mythological concept. Since bestowal of names is a source of pride, it follows that a child often receives several from the ancestral families of which he is a member; the possession of these is a source of gratification to the owner.

An ancestral name given to a child is spoken of as an dogbad name, and the recipient as ts dogbad, which may be translated, "commoner." He may be given several names from one origin myth, or ones from diverse origin myths if his parents are members of different ancestral families. These designations may either be those brought down from above by the first people, those made on this earth by them, or those made at some important event by later persons. Irrespective of what combination of these possibilities a child may have, he is still a commoner, and his ability to rise to the position of chief depends on his own, or his parents', ability to give potlatches, as will be described in the next chapter. In such a case his dogbad name is said to have been elevated to that of a nilkuay (chief's) name.

Politically, the village is the most important Bulu Centre unit. Usually, though not always related to one another, the inhabitants are always friends. If an attack is made on a village by a hostile war-party, all the inhabitants suffer equally. On the other hand, if the residents decide to attack another settlement, there is no compulsion for anyone to share the burden. Each individual, with the exception of slaves, follows his own inclination. In the case of murder or other wrong inflicted by an individual, the responsibility rests on his immediate family, not the village. Factions within the village seem to have been unimportant; individual jealousies were common, and often led to murder, but if a family became unpopular or considered itself aggrieved, it usually moved to another village. Neighbouring settlements were generally on friendly terms and often assisted each other in war, but this was not compulsory. Indeed, cases are known in which a war-party from the same town, about to attack Ewondo passed within a quarter of a mile of Bonga to without the inhabitants even warning their threatened neighbours.

As far as internal organization is concerned, the village is as fluid a unit as are most Bulu Centre groupings. If one individual has attained a position of eminence through the potlatch system (vol. I, chap. xv), he is "chief" of the village, and his advice is generally followed. If several men have approximately the same importance, there is no dominating figure. In any case, a chief lacks executive authority, and such chieftainship as he receives is due to his personal influence. Some slight deference is paid to the man who uses the name of the elder of the first group of settlers, the first chief, but this is not sufficient to warrant the title of "chief" with the significance usually attached to the term. The important members of the village are accustomed to meet for the discussion of ceremonial mat-be rendered powerful by magical means or the ritual acts of relatives. Although these often entail great labour and expense, parents seldom neglect their duty; in fact, care for their children is one of the strongest Bella Coola characteristics, though the methods used are so foreign to the white man that he has difficulty in realizing their meaning. The hope of both parents is to have children to carry on their names; infanticide is unknown and the death of an infant is mourned almost as much as that of an adult. Sterility and impotency are frequent causes for divorce.

At the present time there is a high birth-rate in Bella Coola, though the heavy infant mortality prevents any appreciable increase in the population. In the old days, it is said, there were always large families, though much confidence cannot be placed in this statement. In families where there are several children, the first-born, whether boy or girl, assumes an important position. His or her influence, as eldest, is naturally considerable, and the parents foster this through the vague feeling that it is proper for the eldest to be the most important in the family. In adult years, and after marriage, the influence of the eldest of a family continues to have considerable weight with younger brothers and sisters.

If a man is poor he cannot hope to have more than one wife, and his family circle will be limited to their children, and perhaps wealthy parents. On the other hand, a wealthy and powerful man usually has a larger family. Not only may he have several wives, but his aged relatives, and those of his wife, look to him for support and assistance. Such are usually welcome to live in his house; they lend what aid they can in collecting food, and it gratifies a man's pride and sense of power to be closely surrounded by a large family. The Bella Coola are, on the whole, considerate to their aged relatives.[19]

[illegible] not true of the present. During the winter of 1923-4 a feeble old man, living alone, was often in actual want of food. Disliked and despised, of a most disagreeable himself, none of his surviving relatives, of whom the nearest were [illegible], would take him into their houses. Commenting on this man's fate, [illegible] pointed out how, in the old days, such a man could have found

The married sons of a chief usually live in his house, and if he is very powerful the husbands of his daughters may also reside with him. Such a man is at the zenith of power, surrounded by a close group, formed of elderly relatives, of children and grandchildren. Connections by marriage are also added to the family group. At the present time, for example, one Bella Coola man is looking after his brother's widow, and it is felt that she is a member of his family. 592 556 622 602

Another way in which a rich man can increase the size of his family is by adoption. Parents who have lost an infant may adopt the child of some member of the ancestral family of either father or mother. The matter is usually arranged soon after birth, and the transfer takes place immediately after weaning. The real parents are willing since they know that the adopting parents will be able to validate valuable prerogatives and names for the child, which they themselves are unable to do. This desire for their child's welfare overrules parental love. In such cases the real father or mother can likewise bestow names and other prerogatives on the child, who really becomes a member of two families. This is often done by an old couple whose own children have married and moved away, and who thus find themselves lonely. It is considered disgraceful for parents to allow their children to be adopted by anyone not a member of their ancestral family, since that would be an admission of inability to bring up a child in the path of his ancestors. 556 597 614 [188]

"Your father was not strong," could be said to such a child as a reproach.

In the case of an orphan some wealthy relative is almost always ready to adopt him. Consequently, as he grows up, he receives his full share of the ancestral origin myth, and the names embodied therein, so that the loss of his own parents is of little consequence in the course of life. Occasionally a child is not adopted by relatives, and then his fate is indeed hard. 736 599 shelter in the house of any chief, and shared in the food which was being distributed at the almost continuous ceremonial feasts. Now, each family lives alone and no one feels any responsibility for this old man. [178]

THE PROFESSION OF HUNTER

Another profession which is entered by means of an ancestral prerogative is that of hunting. Many Bella Coola have validated their right to this vocation, some by confirming names created by their early ancestors, others by legalizing those brought down from above in the beginning of time. One of the latter is Lalaimkila, "The Brusher Off," so-called because the owner is such a successful hunter that he can sweep mountain goats from the mountains as easily as an ordinary person can brush insects from a wall. Unlike the professions of carpenter and singer, it is believed that legalization of a hunter's name always brings success to the holder; perhaps because everyone is more or less successful, it follows that whatever good fortune is achieved by a professional hunter can be attributed to the validation of his prerogatives. Others, lacking this assistance, may be proficient, but their success never carries with it the social prestige gained by a man who has distributed goods to substantiate the prerogative.

There is a difference of opinion among the Bella Coola as to whether or not certain hunting methods are inheritable prerogatives. With the introduction of rifles, these have long been discontinued, and no definite information was obtained regarding the social position of their users. Several of the older men believed that the contrivances depended upon ancestral prerogatives, whereas others stated that they were merely individual discoveries which could have been, and in many cases were, imitated by anyone. It seems probable that most of the following practices are prerogatives, although it may be that they are no more than special hunting devices suitable only in certain areas and, therefore, limited to the members of the ancestral family owning that particular locality.

The method about which the most definite information was obtained, was one formerly employed by a certain Nuxalpiy to catch goats at Tal'in. According to one elderly Bella Coola,

1:McIlwraith K-5 (1922-1924) 1948

225 small ocean-going canoe, with an assistant who passed his paddle through the water in such a way that a slight phosphorescent streak resulted. This resembled the course of a salmon. In a short time a seal would rise in pursuit of the "fish," and the watchful hunter would harpoon it. The seal would rush off with the head of the weapon, which was attached by a long line to the shaft remaining in the hunter's hand. He would play it like a huge fish, until the exhausted animal was drawn to the side of the canoe and clubbed. Several seals were often obtained by this means in the course of a single night.

224 424 The two usual methods of killing mountain goats are by cornering them with dogs and then choking them to death, or by shooting with rifle or bow. There was formerly a special method of snaring which had been handed down as a prerogative from the time of the first people. The hunter used to set his snares on a precipitous path commonly used by goats and had remarkable success. Others might know how to make snares and where the hunter set them, but no one would ever attempt this method of hunting without the proper prerogative. Another right, enjoyed by another hunter, was the catching of bears in a similar way in snares.

424 551 182 Little need be said in conclusion about these particular privileges, except to emphasize that they are merely an aspect of the principle of validated prerogatives which permeates every phase of Bella Coola life. It is as natural for a man to be made a singer or a hunter by the distribution of presents as it is for him to acquire a dance by the same means. Each is contained in an ancestral myth, and the validation of the prerogative enables the incumbent either to function actively, or at least to enjoy the social prestige attached to the craftsman who has been duly confirmed in his vocation. The necessity of bestowing gifts to validate a prerogative introduces an economic element to the concept, but this is lessened by the fact that a poor man can acquire a name by a relatively small expenditure though he must forgo the prestige enjoyed by a man who has been able to elevate his professional names in a lavish manner. Selection is a constant factor in the social life of a Bella Coola; the man who uses all his wealth to acquire a firm seat cannot be "strong" in nuxnk matters; the man who desires to specialize in hactsa affairs cannot afford to display an elaborate totem-pole. Amid these conflicting desires, it often happens that a man somewhat neglects his professional prerogatives, especially those of which the dignity has been slightly lessened through superior skill shown by individuals endowed with no more than native ability. Upstarts of this kind have always infringed upon professional dignity, and the coming of the white man has added a new factor which has almost destroyed vocational prerogatives.

A'alt Dances

The most important, as well as the most spectacular, dances that occur at potlatches are those given by members of the nuxnk society. In addition to these, a feature of many potlatches is the performance of a'alt dances.[1] As already mentioned, from 1870 onwards there have been many changes in nuxnk ritual; new elements have been acquired by the marriages of Bella Coola to members of the coastal tribes, with the result that details of procedure vary at every ceremony according to the prerogatives of the donor. Since 1910, the influence of white civilization has increased to such an extent that nuxnk ceremonials have virtually been abandoned. This took place at a time when the ritual was in transition, a state of affairs which rendered difficult the collection of coherent information. A'alt dances are associated with nuxnk, but the addition of new features to the latter was accompanied by a decay of the former. Both societies have now almost ceased to exist, but whereas the nuxnk organization was abandoned during a period of change and secession, that

177 of the a'alk came to an end when it was already waning in 535 importance. It was impossible to obtain as much detailed 575 information about the latter as was desired, and it is even 128 possible that some of the facts recorded in connection with nuxnk ceremonial really belong to a'alk rites.

The right to perform an a'alk dance depends upon a duly 424 validated ancestral prerogative of which the obvious mark is 535 an a'alk name. Some of the first people brought down such 575 designations and dances with them from above in the beginning of time, a few were acquired on this earth as gifts from super-[773] natural beings. Those who have rights of this kind form a loose organization which may be termed the a'alk society.
This is closely associated both with the nuxnk society and with chiefs, owing to the occurrence of the three types of names in the same ancestral myths. One member of an ancestral family may use his goods to validate his ancestral name, [554] another to make himself a nuxnk, a third to become an a'alk, and an important chief, endowed with ability and wealth, may be able to do all these.

A'alk dances are less spectacular than those of either the nuxnk or hamat'sa societies, nor are rattles or whistles used.
The prerogatives of a member are limited to his name, the right to perform a certain dance, and the use of a song which commonly describes some feature of his ancestral myth. Four types of dances are considered to be a'alk; the methods of acquiring and using any one of these are similar, so it is unnecessary to describe the differences before the actual account of the performance of each.

holder of the potlatch, may wish to confirm a prerogative and 556 requests the donor to allow this to take place at his ceremony. 575 Permission is never refused, since the more incidental rites, the greater is the prestige of the whole. The young man on whom the name is to be confirmed is always told what is planned for him, and his relatives instruct him what to do.

As the time for the potlatch draws near, the donor requests the singers to prepare an a'alk song for the youth. The theme [533] always deals with some incident of his ancestral story with which the singers are already familiar. If a number of youths are to be made a'alk, a song must be composed for each. The 532 carpenters are also requested to make for the initiate one, or sometimes two, masks representing a supernatural being, either 556 human or animal, connected with the myth in which occurs 575 the a'alk name about to be conferred. The design is chosen by the senior members of the ancestral family concerned; it is usually, though not necessarily, the same as that employed by the last incumbent of the name. If the designation about to be confirmed is one which came down from above in the beginning of time, the mask usually represents the guise adopted by the first user of the name; if the prerogative were obtained on earth, it portrays the being from whom the right was received. These arrangements are made in secret, and are known only to the craftsmen, the donor of the potlatch, and his family.

On the night of sdâtsum, when the work for the potlatch is 556 allotted, the youth who is to be made an a'alk is confined 575 within the back-room of the house, presumably in company with the sisaxl initiates, though there is ambiguity on this point. After the general arrangements have been made, an elderly a'alk whose aid has been requested, suddenly rushes from the house as if he had heard some noise. One of the sisi, or an influential chief, makes some allegedly witty remark as to why he has gone out, and then follows, taking with him the dance head-dress belonging to the a'alk. This is identical with the type worn by sisaxl, one of the many points of resemblance [184] [535]

552 575 [184] [292] [535] between the two societies. Presently the elderly a'alt returns, clad in his ceremonial costume consisting of the head-gear, a blanket, and a narrow apron from which hang deer hooves, small pieces of copper, or other jingling articles. The singers strike up his song, and he dances near the fire in a manner depending upon which of the four dances he has the right to perform. Again the sôki leaves the house; when he returns he announces that a tutsinaw is coming with a song for the youth, naming the one who is to be made an a'alt. A moment passes, and in stalks a masked figure depicting the form taken by the first ancestor of the novice, or the being from which one of his later forefathers received an a'alt prerogative. Sometimes two of these beings appear. The apparition circles the fire, stops beside the singers, and chants a song to them in a low voice. Then it enters the back-room and is seen no more. Presently the singers strike up the song they have just heard. To those who are neither a'alt nor nuxsê it seems that the song was brought by the supernatural visitor; in reality, it is the one previously composed by the singers and taught by them to the wearer of the mask to lend realism to the performance. The youth concealed within the back-room does not emerge on this occasion, the song is merely sung in practice. Sometimes the masked figure appears during the daytime and walks openly along the shore of the river like a foreign guest, as indeed it is said to be.

[184] [198] The coming of a tutsinaw is one of the points of resemblance between a'alt and nuxsê rites. The older people agree that this has long been a feature of the former society, adopted by the latter in recent years. The description given in this section appears to be of the original and proper use, although, as already noted, the nuxsê have recently employed tutsinaw for somewhat different purposes.

It is uncertain whether or not the a'alt novice remains secluded any longer within the back-room. In ancient times he probably did, but with the recent growth of the nuxsê

society and decline of the a'alk, concealment has become limited to initiates of the former organization. 556 575

No more a'alk dances take place during the potlatch preliminaries, but with the coming of the first group of foreign guests, the host displays as many types of dance as he is entitled to, including a'alk if he has the necessary prerogative. On this occasion other a'alk, especially relatives of the donor, give their dances, the only time that such are used at potlatches except by novices receiving names. This is repeated on the arrival of every party of guests. [178] 556 575 535

Meanwhile the novice, or novices, has been practising the proper steps for his appearance, which always occurs immediately before the entry of the masked figure representing the donor's dead relative. As already mentioned, there are four kinds of a'alk dances, known as nacpual,[4] ilaiyakaw, gi'aqa, and aw'hl'a. A similar song is used for a dancer of any one of these four; the text describes some small incident of the ancestral myth in which the name occurs, such as the bringing down of the prerogative by the first incumbent in the beginning of time. At the proper moment, the singers beat this out and the audience joins them in singing it. Then the singers begin to strike rapidly on the floor with double beats, assisted by the guests who clap their hands in rapid couplets. Out comes the dancer, resplendent in his head-dress decorated with weasel skins, and women with the required prerogative begin to dance. If his prerogative is as a ilaiyakaw or gi'aqa, he proceeds to a place beside the fire and begins to run around it, sideways, in short mincing steps, revolving at the same time on himself. He clasps his hands behind his back and bends down, then stands upright with palms extended upwards, never ceasing to move his feet in rapid steps. This type of dance is far more violent than a nacpual one, and the amount of energy expended by a dancer in his rapid circuits of the fire is tremendous. Never, even for a moment, are his feet quiet, while his body twists and bends in an amazing fashion. After two

[4] Among the supernatural beings, the nacpual is a pouting mountain goat.

552 or three rounds he retires utterly exhausted. The time beaten 575 out for a naxpual or ow'hl'a dancer is the same. He too comes 535 near the fire and at first dances in the same manner until the [599] singers in unison bellow out, W'ai-, "More." With a run that ends in a crashing leap that seems to shake the floor, the performer takes his position between the fire and one of the side walls and begins to revolve furiously upon himself. His body is bent forward until it seems as if all that prevents him from falling to the floor is his hands clutched together as far as possible behind his back; while his feet move so rapidly that the short mincing steps run into each other. Gradually the beating becomes less violent, only to be followed by another cry of W'ai-, and another rush and jump that lands the dancer behind the fire. Here he revolves once more in the same furious fashion; the same is repeated on the side of the fire opposite to the place where he first performed, and finally between the fire and the door. Naxpual and ow'hl'a are the most strenuous of all Bella Coola dances and the performer is glad to retire. He afterwards joins the audience. This dance entails no taboo or restrictions on the dancer.

This terminates the performance of this type of dance at a potlatch, but among the goods distributed are some to validate the name acquired by the dancer, and others to legalize his actual display.

574 The occasion on which importance and solemnity are 575 attached to o'alt dances is during potlatches, but they are 535 also given at other times. Most Bella Coola performances are so steeped in the presence of the supernatural that the element of enjoyment is secondary, but in the spring, when the [794] and of the Raven season has heralded the warmer mode of the clowns, dances for pleasure are of common occurrence. A naxul can call his fellows to his house and the singers beat out naxul songs to which the owsura dance, but the most common beats are o'alt. Of course an individual may be a member of both societies, but the hostile invite the guests in his o'alt name. These summoned include both members of the society

patrons and claiming to possess supernatural powers. In contrast to the a'alt, the hactat are well organized and regulated; its members are proud of their powers, and scornful of those who lack the same. Under these circumstances, it is not difficult to understand jealousy between the two. Until relatively recent times, the a'alt were numerically stronger, and included some chiefs, whereas the strength of the hactat society depended on the supernatural strength claimed by its members. It is true that individuals occasionally belonged to both, if they happened to possess prerogatives of both kinds, but, as a rule, the a'alt were young men and the hactat were older people. This rivalry was formerly so intense that all who were not members of the latter society were often termed a'alt irrespective of whether or not they actually possessed dances of that type; Carrier Indians alone were not so designated. During the summer, members of the two societies dwelt amicably together, but during the winter, when dances took place, there were continual bickerings. The hactat constantly endeavoured to impress their rivals with their own prowess; while the a'alt, not convinced of the others' power, used to mock them in their songs. This was the usual practice in case of some error in hactat ritual. The a'alt frequently disobeyed the orders of the hactat and a number of them once tried to pry up a huge boulder beneath which was the "power" of a certain hactat (II, p. 6). In recent years the hactat society has entirely gained the supremacy, but it is agreed by all Bella Coola that in former years this was by no means the case, and that a'alt did not hesitate even to kill one of their rivals.

Miscellaneous Ceremonies

The rites described in this chapter and the one preceding comprised the greatest of the Bella Coola so far as its aborigines could be known. Until the increase of wealth in recent years, the potlatch was rare, and it is unlikely that in any village more than one month in the year was consumed in the

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE5

556 performance of rites of this kind. But sociological and ethical [182] concepts, shown at their highest development in the potlatch, are not limited to a few weeks of the year, or to any class of the community. Generosity on a large scale can be publicly [577] displayed by chiefs alone, but to a lesser degree this virtue must be practised by everyone, since avarice is considered a 576 major sin. Anyone who happens to pass a house in which a 574 meal is taking place must be invited to share it; to do otherwise would be considered rude. The person summoned must take at least a trifle to show that he is not churlish and too proud to eat with his host, while if he is hungry, he shares whatever is being served as a matter of course. The head of [177] the family should be the first to taste any wine* as proof that [293] it is not poisoned, but otherwise he fares little, if any, better
[342] than his guests. This custom is now rapidly falling into disuse [414] through the construction of individual family houses with doors and locks. The fisherman who has exclusive rights to a suitable place for netting olachen or salmon must give some of his
476 catch to anyone who asks him. If he has landed four salmon, [226] the first solicitor is given one, later comers, none at all. When a net is set in the river, anyone passing is allowed to raise it and take some of the contents; if there are two fish, he may remove one, if many, three or four. To take all would be a [685] despicable theft, sufficient to brand the transgressor as greedy;
[626] hence public opinion prevents the system from being carried

556 Presents of this kind increase the prestige of the donor who 431 has thus acted in accordance with Bella Coola ethics, and are advantageous investments since others must reciprocate. The system is carried to such lengths that, until recent years, it was more profitable to give away goods than to sell them. In the case of a sale, the purchaser endeavours to give as little as possible, whereas the recipient of a gift returns as much as he can. Several of the older people mentioned that early white traders would have received more for their goods by giving them away than by selling.

Even at the present time the Bella Coola sometimes carry out a practice which was once common. Particularly in the early autumn or in spring, a chief who has large supplies of food may decide to show his wealth to the members of a neighbouring tribe such as the Bella Bella. Alone, or with a few friends, he goes to a foreign village where he is sure to find accommodation in the home of some friend, relative, or important chief. In the evening he invites the inhabitants of his host's village to the house in which he is staying, and uses the food he has brought with him to provide them with an elaborate meal. His guests now feel it incumbent on them to repay this generosity, and one of them asks the singers to beat out one of his songs, the Bella Bella equivalent to nuxnit, o'alt, or even hactat. The owner dances to it and then gives presents to the stranger to validate the performance he has just witnessed. This is repeated by everyone to whom he has given food, and although each present may be small, their total is greater than the original outlay. Sometimes a poor man, feeling himself too insignificant to give a ceremony of this kind, takes a supply of food to a foreign tribe to sell. If the hosts wish to show their generous dispositions they persuade him to give it away in the fashion just described, which always brings in more than he could obtain by sale. It is even customary for the hosts to lend such a stranger enough food for public distribution if his own stock is too small.

Although the most important Bella Coola dances are performed at potlatches or during the hactat season, they are not confined to these periods. Professional singers do nothing else but, except during the run of salmon when everyone is busy fishing, a dance occurs every few nights. Supernatural beings are not called down; consequently there is little solemnity and everyone has a good time. On these occasions, hactat songs are first beaten out, followed by nuxnit and o'alt, and the owner

533 of each song dances to it. Anyone who has enough food to 535 provide a meal for all is glad to invite his neighbours to such 574 an affair, but the singers and heralds can force a stingy man to act as host. Everyone knows his neighbour's resources and the singers have no hesitation in going to the house of a man with an ample supply of food and beginning to beat out songs
[214] there. The heralds are quick to see what is happening and [624] call the people, with the result that the involuntary host is compelled to provide a meal in order not to be thought mean and churlish. Without waiting for the singers to take the [203] initiative, heralds likewise often invite people to the house of a man whom they know to be well provided with food.

During the summer, the necessity of laying in supplies of [221] salmon makes it impossible to hold many dances, although one [996] of the non-sacred type just described takes place whenever there is a lull in the fishing. In the early autumn, when berries, fish, and game are abundant, the thoughts of chiefs turn 556 to potlatches and the lengthy preliminaries are begun. At this 792 season, too, a chief who lacks sufficient wealth to invite foreign [221] guests, calls in his neighbours for a round dance and initiates
[375] some of his young relatives into that society. The ritual,
[535] described in the last chapter, resembles that of a potlatch except that no new house is constructed, there is no return of a dead relative, and the ceremonial connected with the coming of foreigners is necessarily omitted. In some cases a chief performs this type of rite a year before he proposes to hold a potlatch, and explains that he is doing so because he will be unable to give presents to the inhabitants of his own village [434] at the later affair. Gifts so distributed are returnable with interest, though it is not obligatory for recipients to do this in time for the donor to make use of their repayment at his potlatch.

Ceremonials of this nature occupy the Bella Coola during [575] the early autumn, while in winter tsaiat dances take place

ciss, wadekdaw. This can be described here, since, although not closely associated with the potlatch, it serves to teach children the principles of present-giving and indebtedness. February is the preparatory month for wadekdaw, although preliminary arrangements are made early in the winter. A chief who has a son or daughter about ten or twelve years of age may decide to use alloy of his food, and a small part of his wealth, for the benefit of the child. With the assistance of his relatives, the father begins making large numbers of toy canoes, miniature bows and arrows, small baskets, and models of all other types of articles commonly given away at potlatches. The manufacture of these requires several months, but towards the end of January they are nearly ready.

A name must then be chosen for the child. Since a wadekdaw dance is a humorous, non-sacred affair, a wadekdaw name is not embodied in a myth, but is drawn from some story. Occasionally, parents decide on a new one, but more often the designation selected is one used for the same purpose by a grandparent of the child. There is no rivalry with regard to names of this type, and one of them can be re-used without asking consent of the last incumbent, although permission would never be refused. There must be a song with each name and the grandparents and other elderly relatives teach this to a number of boys who are to act as singers. The words may have been remembered from a previous occasion; if not, a simple theme is composed by one of the old people having some reference to the name about to be conferred. For example, one appellation of this type is Tqelnar, Fawn, and the accompanying words are:

"We hear that Deer has borne a child."

Another name is Qolw, Beaver, and the song: "Be of good cheer, the Beaver is coming."

A third song is, "Go outside under the house like a dog."

Occasionally a small incident in an ancestral myth is used. The teaching of the song to the juvenile singers is a source of constant merriment; the parents and grandparents are the 852 principal instructors, aided by the professional musicians.

867 Boys are always willing to act as singers for the practice they

[535] assembled, the boy singers beat out the donor's song and he dances to it. It may be in the nature of a nuseek, a'alk, or kwaiar dance, according to the wishes of his parents. In many cases, one of the grandparents or some other old relative likewise dances to the song, using whatever style he chooses. There is no ceremonial significance to the ceremony and all enjoy themselves immensely, especially the adult guests. After
[554] the gifts have been handed round. The necessity for food and presents makes it impossible for any but the children of chiefs to enjoy this training.

After the ceremony, the children parade up and down the sidewalk in front of the houses, singing boisterously. The performance has been for their benefit and they wish to "show off." One night completes the affair, but the following afternoon another child may summon his comrades to a similar

ceremony. The child singers first beat out the song of the present donor, then that of his predecessor, to which the latter dances once again. If food is plentiful, nuxûxûmy ceremonies may be carried out every day for several weeks, or a year or two may elapse without one. A child's song is remembered from year to year and he dances whenever it is beaten out. The name acquired in this way is used semi-jocularly by a lad's comrades. After marriage, it is considered unfitting for a youth to be concerned with nuxûxûmy and he normally becomes an a'alk. 852 867 [796] [533] [535] [551] [815]

Ceremonies of this kind have been discontinued for many years and it was impossible to obtain detailed accounts. The main features are clear: they served to instruct children in the methods of present-giving. According to one informant, there were two types of nuxûxûmy ceremonial; one of the humorous pattern above described in which, however, food alone was given away, and another in which miniature presents were distributed. This man believed that the latter was only possible for the children of wealthy chiefs, and that on such occasions the themes consisted of small incidents in the family myth. In either case, the importance of ceremonial can be judged from the manner in which it was impressed upon mere children. [182] [556]

In the beginning of time there came down from Nuxmit'a to Nuxalk a man whose name was Kimtilong[b]. As a present from Sqamtin he had brought with him a model of Nuxmit'a, which he set up on this earth and to which he gave the same name. This was after the first sun[c] sky, had fallen; it was from this catastrophe that Kimtilong[b] derived his name.

Kimtilong[b] had sun at the mouth of Nuxmit'a the face of a grizzly bear, in consequence of which he used that animal for all his decorations. His blankets, food boxes, spoons, all were adorned with grizzly bear designs; the door of his house, Nuxmit'a, was the mouth of one which opened to admit a guest, and closed when he had entered. The dwelling, which lengthened of its own accord whenever Kimtilong[b] gave a potlatch, endured for generations.[d] Before the door there lay on his back a man, Ki'ulem, with a huge stomach on which anyone entering the house had to step; a slave or commoner did so without emitting noise, but when a mighty chief trod on Ki'ulem his weight drew forth a groan from the mumbling man.[d] Any chief entering gave to Kimtilong[b] a slave, a canoe, or a copper, "to open the door," otherwise the mouth of the grizzly bear would snap shut and kill him.

Kimtilong[b] was powerful enough to give many potlatches; when planning one, he began his preparations early in the spring for the following winter. First he brought his canoe before his house, covered its grizzly bear nose with urine, and bent upon it with evergreen boughs. This was a signal that he proposed to go on a raiding expedition, and his fellow villagers were always glad to follow him. His forays were always successful due to his own power and because he took care when entering his destination to send forward a scouting party to determine the number of hostile houses and decide how many attackers should be allotted to deal with each. On one occasion he attacked the Fort Rupert people and captured a woman of chief's rank, who begged him not to enslave her, promising him her name, Wi'nasa-ulmala or Kuala. He agreed to her request and she tied a long leather line around her neck and told the other women to grasp it; those who did so were spared. In the same attack Kimtilong[b] made use of a Fort Rupert slave whom he bribed to [c]The important chief is always said to be "heavy" by virtue of the goods he has given away, and this expresses graphically the style of thought.

[illegible] OF A [illegible] [illegible]*

In the beginning [illegible] came down to [illegible], a place east of [illegible], two men with their respective wives. The men's names were [illegible] and [illegible], and those of the women, *[illegible] and [illegible].

[illegible] [illegible] [illegible]*

In the beginning there came down to [illegible], on Salmon Fish, a woman whose name was [illegible]. On the shore of a lake near there she became a shaman, through a vision of which the details are lost. To show the continued goodwill of the power residing in the lake [illegible] a two mast ship sailed upon the water night down and lived underfoot, and sent this water when creating patterns. One day when she was singing, she was overheard by [illegible], [illegible], [illegible], [illegible], [illegible], and [illegible], who had come to earth on the Dean River, [illegible] and were travelling by canoe, looking for a suitable place to settle. The four first named were brothers, the remaining two their sisters. Attracted by the song the six landed and ultimately chose [illegible] as their abode, where they lived amicably with the powerful [illegible]. In this they were fortunate, for she was so magically endowed that she had success in whatever she undertook.

these times, and these moments grew apparent, itself, on the ground before him. He took the fan from the stomach of a yowling and carried it to his father, who had walked some distance away, to proof that he had had success in his hunting, then returned to the place where he had been abandoned.

That morning, with in hand, he went to the edge of the forest where he stood looking down from the rim of the settlement, as the appointed being had instructed him, and prayed to Mwadze for forests. After praying he looked around and found four large buildings standing on the spot, on the first set on angle, on the second a kingfisher, on the third a gull, and on the fourth an owl. The angle-economic, as angles are commonly called in the early morning, and at once the forest on which it set was filled with all manner of goods, including boxes containing the large cone-shaped whistles such as are used for coach announcements. During the day the kingfisher settled, the gull called, the owl hooted, and at each attempt to set the forest on which it set was filled with all kinds of goods, foods, shoes, blankets, and household utensils. With the assistance of acquired Mkwa gave a potlatch to which he announced the people from far and near. The whistles sounded, imitating the voices of the four birds which had set on the buildings and through the cries of which they had been filled. The Bulu Bulu chief, Wiyayamatu, covered his head with his blanket because he had nothing to repay the kingfisher, so Mkwa gave him a whistle with to boot. All the guests were witnesses of the transaction, and it was in this way that the coach announcement reached Bulu Bulu.

Mkwa lived to a great age, and during his lifetime moved to several places, to each of which he gave potlatches. His last stopping-place was Canada, where he held the longest rite, erecting for the purpose a new house with six rows of seats to hold the audience. It was there that he died.

Whenever a descendant of Mkwa gives a potlatch he erects outside his house a totem-pole on which are the four birds that brought good fortune to his ancestor.

the house in imitation of Sqoqqwa's; since then any possessor of this amulet wears his jaw likewise. From that time Sqoqqwa has been a common Bella Bella[illegible], and is always shown with his huge jaw.

The narrator claimed this myth through the marriage of his mother's mother with an alien man.

[MYTH OF SEA-LION ISLAND][illegible]

In the beginning of time the sea-lions came down to earth on an island outside Rivers Inlet where they lived and multiplied. The place is still known as Sea-Lion Island and hunters from all parts of the coast used to go there, as the animals were not only good food but easy to kill.

On one occasion one had wandered apart from his companions and saw a strange sight—a house. He accepted and followed his host into a nearby house though he had never known before that there was one in the vicinity. Once within, the door closed with a metallic crash and the sea-lion vanished from the sight of his companions, who thought that he must have been drowned. But he had really entered a sea-lion house. The animals were sitting around their fire exactly as human beings are accustomed to do; in fact, the only strange thing was that they were very human bone-cups as dishes. He listened to their conversation.

"Lend your dish to Sqoqqwa," he heard one of the animals say to a friend.

Sqoqqwa was an old woman who was sitting in one corner of the house.

"The dish will be too small to hold a meal," thought the sea-lion.

The sea-lions read understood his thoughts.

"Don't say that," said one of them. "Sqoqqwa has the power of making the dish inexhaustible."

Presently one of the hosts gave the man a bone-cup dish containing a delicious meal of salmon soaked in oil.

"This meal is enough for me," he thought.

But again a sudden misapprehension came into his mind. It was this: The man knew he could eat no more, but the amount of food on the plate did not diminish.

He stayed with them for several months, but at last grew homesick and lonely. He spoke and his servitude desire.

"Your home is on the ocean," said one of them. "We will send you there whenever you like. You are tired of a meal; would you prefer one that will carry you a mile, or two, or three, or ten?"

The man thought of the job with which he would strike the beach if

Other people had come down to earth at the same time as Kimsa-a, and among them a man and his wife who had landed at the mouth of Gee Bay. They had two daughters who, walking one day at the head of the bay, were surprised to find a house. They looked in and saw a woman, so covered, and laughed heartily to find her made of cotton wood. They kicked over the figure and the head fell into the fire and was burnt. Then they entered themselves in her place, worked diligently at the blanket and ate a large amount of the food. Towards dusk they put the figure back in place and left themselves.

Soon Kimsa-a returned. He endowed the figure, called her a good wife, and thanked her for weaving so diligently and for having eaten so much of the food. Then he saw that the head burnt her head, and chided her, saying that she must take better care of herself. At this the two girls who were being burnt not laughing and showed themselves. They suggested to Kimsa-a that he choose one of them for his wife. He agreed, selected the elder and married her. He built a house on a hilltop where they lived and to which he called people from far and near when he gave a potlatch.

Animal Origins Myths

As already stated, many animal names are believed to have come down from above with the first Bella Coola, or to have been created by them on this earth. In such cases, the animal origin myth is the same as the ancestral myth. Theoretically, names of the same type can also be received through visions in which a beholder is given his new designation by some supernatural being, or taken it from the apparition. In either case, of course, it must be duly validated by the giving of presents. Only three myths were obtained which deal solely with the acquisition of a animal guardian. No doubt this is chiefly to be explained by the fact that most animal cries have been derived from the Bella Bella.

poverty-stricken," say the elders. "If you do, you will become like them yourself."

As a boy grows older, his father insists that he wash, pray, and practice other ritual acts likely to win approval from supernatural beings. He is frequently beaten to move him to better ship. By the time a youth is eleven or twelve years of age he has become fully acquainted with the principles of the patriarch system and a wise parent teaches him to remember debts. Taking his son to some quiet spot in the woods, he makes a small bundle of cedar twigs, for example, and tells him:

"Six-and-so at Bella Bella gave you fifteen beaver skins. When you see this bundle you must think of those skins."

Then he takes another bunch, perhaps of spruce twigs, to represent a present from a Rivers Inlet chief. A bundle of nettle fibre may stand for a Kitsumgalum debt; one ornamented with a tuft of undyed cedar-bark, a gift from a Tsimshian chief; a solid piece of cedar-root, a local debt; another section of cedar-root with a notch in it, another local debt, and so on. The son is expected to learn consciously, and to repeat after his father what each represents. Then the pupil turns his back and the instructor alters the positions of the bundles. His father tells him to look at them and repeat what each signifies. This is repeated time after time until a boy becomes familiar with remembering debts by means of symbols. In later years, if he becomes a chief, he will use this method for bearing his indebtedness in mind. No system of conventional signs has been evolved, each individual merely designates what he wishes by a mark which he alone can recognize.

A child grows up in the community, absorbing information and law without conscious effort, learning the activities which he will later practise, fearing the supernatural beings that are dreaded by his parents, marvelling at the power of those endowed with supernatural ability, and generally fitting himself for the struggle of life. If his parents are wealthy, he may be fortunate enough to be given a name and to partake in initiation ceremony, but he cannot himself carry out a ceremony until he has reached manhood.

Puberty Rites

The change from childhood to adult age is, of course, more obvious with girls than with boys, and the former alone must observe strict taboos. Menstrual blood, like that which follows delivery, is unclean, especially that omitted at the first discharge. A woman who has just given birth is a cmiskc, an adolescent girl, a sqoomi, that is, "A Person Not Fully Grown"; the attitude with which the former is regarded is bold, in a lesser extent, for the latter.

At the first indication, the girl asks a woman to inform her mother of her condition, and goes home immediately if she happens to be away at the time. The parents at once make a small enclosure or bedroom of planks or matting in either of the front corners of the house, providing it with a trap-door and ladder by which she can leave without passing through the front door. There the girl must lie for four days, with legs close together and hers at the knees, never stretched out straight. She is not allowed to drink anything, and must eat sparingly. If she should consume much food, she would be greedy when an adult. When necessary for her to leave the enclosure, a woman must always accompany her. The mother, or some other female relative, provides her with the usual soft cedar-bark pads. On the fifth day, she leaves her shelter early in the morning with one feminine friend and goes to a secluded pool back in the forest, where she washes for the first time. Then she runs rapidly through the woods, which has the effect of making her a strong woman. Should a girl fail to do this, she would be afflicted with an illness caused by the salmon, become blind, and die young.

For one year an adolescent girl is subject to many restrictions. The rear approach to the river would offend the salmon and cause them to avoid Bella Coola, so she is not allowed to dress twice, or even to appear on the beach. She may not eat bundle of four numerous-shaped shells, probably Tonnelum, which are said to have been imported from the north in early times. These marks serve to indicate the position of the girl, who is both feared and respected, possessed of supernatural power, and yet beautiful. Many Bella Coola stories describe how adolescent girls have been able to vanquish supernatural beings; perhaps the most striking of these is the manner in which they were saved mankind when the sun came too close to the earth. At the end of a year, or eleven months according to one old woman, the seclusion is terminated, and the girl resumes her normal activities. The first time she goes to the river she must throw on the water four pieces of food, and four pieces of undyed cedar-bark. This is especially important if the salmon are running in the river, although no explanation of this ritual is given.

The assumption of her freedom indicates that a girl has reached marriageable age. Chiefs sometimes confine their daughters for even longer than a year, and usually delay their marriages for several years to demonstrate their importance, but this is not necessary, nor is it practiced by other than wealthy individuals. It is not uncommon for a girl to wed before her year is over, in that case her menstrual seclusion lapses. Chiefs never allow such a curtailment for their daughters, as to do so would diminish the prestige of the house, and be detrimental to the status of their children when they marry and have families. Illicit intercourse with a secluded adolescent is considered not only illegal but disgusting as well. Between the period of betrothement and marriage, intercourse is prohibited and guarded against by the parents of a girl, but is not considered filthy and seems to have been fairly common in former times with the daughters of poor people and slaves. This sometimes took place before the first menstruation in spite of the disapproval with which this was regarded.

Although the menstrual blood which appears at the first discharge is considered more beneficial than that secured on later occasions, it is always regarded as unclean or unclean. It is dances in time to it. Using their own discretion, the musicians proceed to beat out the time for hacint after hacint, and each performs. In like fashion they then beat out the time of one sound after another, and each member of that society gives his dance. Since none of the supernatural beings is present, the affair is non-sacred. The singers consult with the host as to the number of songs to be used. When they stop at last, X's father, aided by his younger relatives, gives valuable presents of food. No mention of the coming marriage is made, but the sun gives the donor an opportunity of displaying his generosity as a chief and indirectly increases the importance of the wedding because the value of the food will later be remembered in connection with it. [589]

If X's father is very wealthy, he may recall the people for several nights, always providing the same type of entertainment, and always giving food. He uses his own judgment as to the number of such entertainments; but at that which he decides shall be the last, he announces:

"Tomorrow we shall go to Y's father's house."

If X's father does not wish to give away such large quantities of food he may omit the dancing in his own house and make this announcement at a potlatch, a hacint dance,* or any other public gathering. But the more elaborate the ceremonial, the greater is the importance of the marriage in the eyes of the Bella Coola, which in turn increases the strength of the children who may result from it. [558]

On the morning after this declaration, X's father calls to his house those whom he wishes to be witnesses of the alliance that has been planned. These include as many of his relatives and those of his wife as he desires, and other intimate friends. These individuals comprise the group interested, on behalf of X, in the marriage; they provide the goods which are given for him, and receive the presents from the corresponding group of Y's relatives. dance, taking as inconspicuous a part as X does in the whole affair. As the singers start the marriage song, some of X's relatives carry into Y's house a part of the goods which X's relatives have assumed for the occasion, deposit them on the floor near the door, and then withdraw. These goods are said, "to sweep the house." Long ago they are said to have been of great value, though nowadays small presents are considered ample. Any member of Y's family can accept one by picking it from the floor, but as he is expected to return the gift with something of greater value, sometimes nothing is taken. Should none of his relatives appear willing to do so, it devolves on Y's father to accept the present.

When the marriage song has ended, X's father gives to some strong youth narrow strips of goat-skin with the wool still attached. Carrying these in one hand the young man runs up and down the sidewalk, waving his arms, and at intervals throwing one of the strips into the air, away from himself. All the younger people of the village pursue him, and a wild scramble takes place for each strip. Sometimes, instead of running up and down, the running is done in a clear space near Y's house. Only the sons of important chiefs are prohibited from this sport, since it is thought to be beneath their dignity. It is an animated scene, in which the participants thoroughly enjoy themselves. Thereafter have the right to ask any dancer for his clothing, and unless he is willing to lose this, he must give a present to the one who has demanded it. This is a common source of amusement to the onlookers. Nothing is known of the origin or meaning of the wholesale giving away of strips of goat-skin, nor why the heralds should be able to demand clothing on this occasion.

"It has always been done," the Bella Coola say simply.

When the noise has somewhat subsided, the singers again beat out the time of the marriage song, and again the dancers begin to perform. Y's father then sends out one of his male relatives, with gifts, "to stop the dance." The honor given a present to one of the dancers, who cease his gyrations, then dies hence that she has done one of much, but as the practice has not found favour in Bella Coola, it is little to her advantage.*

These complicated marriage rites are necessary to satisfy the pride of the two families in their origin myths, and also serve to establish the resultant children in the paths of their ancestors. Among those or others who lack ceremonial prerogatives, marriage is an affair of slight worth. Such persons simply live together with little ceremony, though they always try to give at least a feast so that there may be witnesses of the transaction. It is immaterial whether or not they marry their own relatives, since no ceremonial prerogatives are to be transmitted.

Y usually lives in the house of X's father, though economic circumstances may compel her husband to live in her house. If the parents are very wealthy, a house may be built for the young people, but usually their home is one of the bedrooms in the house of X's father; this provisional residence exposes Y not only to good advice from her mother-in-law, but often to caustic criticism. The marital life of X and Y does not differ essentially from that of other young couples in any part of the world, and is accordingly difficult to describe. Although love rarely occurs into the original choice of a mate, a similar selection is found in the mutual respect for each other's economy, and the knowledge of the importance of the rites performed with the aid of each other's already numerous. The young people realize that marriage affects the families of both, and accordingly accept it as a matter of course. The Bella Coola are fond of children. Their birth is a matter of sincere rejoicing, partly because it binds the two families more closely together, but personal affection is one of the strongest Bella Coola characteristics. The parents usually spoil their children; infants, especially, are never chastised and rarely [555] [561] [564] adulthood. They grow up in the open environment of the house, absorbing most of their lore by watching and listening than by actual instruction. Their care devolves chiefly on the mother, although at any ceremony the father will be seen arriving with the baby in his arms, while his wife leads another child. Nurses are unknown and the parents take their children with them on all occasions. It is necessary for a mother to be absent on some occasions and her child will be entrusted to a grandmother or other elderly relative. There are no avoidances between the young people and their parents-in-law.

[639] [651] The obligation of potlatch-giving does not stop with the marriage ceremony. Whenever X gives a burial dance or other ceremony, Y's relatives are expected to contribute. It is felt that the weight of the potlatch given them during the period of engagement and at the wedding has become too heavy, and they throw this off by lavish giving. We cannot be kept of the value of gifts borrowed or received, though it is known that the family of the women loses financially in the end. The father of every daughter is regarded as an unfortunate individual, who is always poor and overwhelmed through the necessity of providing for them. By so doing, however, he increases his own prestige, and the Bella Coola have the happy sentiment that such a man manages to get along some way; perhaps necessity causes his ambition. Likewise X's relatives contribute to any ritual carried out by Y's father. If, for example, one of his wife's relatives dies, X and his friends may wish to contribute towards the funeral expenses. In fact, any ceremonial serves as an excuse for relatives by marriage to donate goods and thus demonstrate publicly their influence, importance, and generosity.

[648] [476] The concept of mutual help between families who have intermarried is one that lasts for generations. In upper Dean was in Bella Coola an old Kitamaat man who had left home some forty years earlier and had since lived in Smith Inlet where he married and had a boy. On the death of his wife, this as a guest was regarded as amusing. In many cases, however, some husbands have made a practice of meeting their wives at white men. This is not considered creditable, but the Bulu Code do not strongly condemn breaches of the moral code, which are regarded as the affair of the husband alone. There is said to be a Bulu Bulu custom by which a wife takes as recognized paramour one of the friends of her husband who is thought not only to know of this but to receive the presents which the lover gives his wife. The two continue to be friends and often have together, in fact, their mutual income in the manner is a bond between them. No trace of this practice could be found in Bulu Code.

[illegible]

It has been for long assumed that the Bulu Code are monogamous, we assumption correct only since the period of white dominance. Previous to that time it was quite common for wealthy men to have three, four, or more wives. Polly, the important chief as often mentioned, had nine, ten, or eleven, the exact number is not known. A man wishing to take a second wife could do so in the manner already described, although the period of engagement was usually much shorter, and waiting for his parents-in-law was not expected. The reason for this was obvious to the Bulu Code. None but a chief of importance could afford more than a single wife, and such an one could not be expected to demean himself by waiting for anyone else. Besides, parents were glad to have their daughters married to a great chief, so willingly entered the customary period of servitude. Few retained the distinction of having several wives. So far as could be learned the number of the sexes seems always to have been almost equal, to itself a check to polygamy in a community where practically every adult had a wife. A number of males were always slain in war, and it is to be assumed that polygamy was made possible only through the surplus of women thus created. The great majority of men had a single wife, some chiefs had

A chief's wives always lived in the same house, and it is said that disputes were frequent. Pathe endeavored to prevent jealousy by providing each woman with a special bedroom and sleeping for a single night with each in order. One informant had two wives when a young man, and he found that the only way to avoid constant bickering was by sleeping in one bed, between them. The evidence seems clear that plurality of wives was usually the cause of considerable friction, though this never deterred a man from taking a second wife if he could. The only special rule of incest in this regard was that two sisters could not be married at the same time.

In answer to questions about polyandry, two men told of a licentious woman who had two feeble-minded husbands between whom she used to sleep. The whole affair was considered disgusting, but public opinion did not sanction the offenders since a person's marital affairs were considered to concern the individual only. It was accordingly assumed that the institution of true polyandry did not exist, when, unexpectedly, information was volunteered about its occurrence in the families of influential men. A very powerful chief, if his only child was a daughter, quite frequently married her simultaneously to the sons of other chiefs. She was then considered most fortunate, since only a wealthy man could provide for a daughter in this way, and expend the large quantities of goods necessary to ensure her proper marriage in each case. The husbands were never brothers, and seldom related, since the ambitious parent wished to ally his daughter with different ancestral families for the benefit of any resultant children. The joint wife was accustomed to live for a number of months in the house of one of her husbands, with her other husbands forming part of his household. She would then move to the house of another, who assumed the leadership of the group, with the others, including the one who had just been leader, as follows. It is said that there was rarely friction among the joint husbands, since each realized that his turn would come as head of the household, and meanwhile the wife endeavoured to share her favours indiscriminately. The children were considered equally the offspring of each husband, thus automatically acquiring membership in several economic families. Such were regarded as indeed fortunate, provided with every potential means of assistance in the struggle of life.

Recognizing its importance, every effort was made to verify this information. Further questioning elicited the statement that the informant had never seen a case of this, though he asserted that when a young man he had often heard of it and that the custom had then only recently died out. Another old man and an elderly woman confirmed the above statement almost word for word, and each added that it was well known when they were young, though they had never actually seen it in practice. One man believed that the custom had formerly prevailed in several parts of the coast, and said that he had heard of its occurrence among the "Kwantlen" people near Newton. Considering the reliability of his informants, the writer gives as his personal belief that the institution of polyandry among the daughters of chiefs occurred in Bella Coola not many years ago. Knowledge of the term of address for co-husband, already given, is strong evidence in support of this view.

Since it has been assumed that T is the daughter of a chief, properly married with due formality, it is necessary to digress still further from the account of her relations with X to describe connections of a less creditable nature. The most common of these was with slaves. Though frowned upon by all Bella Coola ethics, such alliances, of a permanent nature, do not appear to have been rare. In some cases it was a man who thus dishonoured himself, in some a woman. Since no slave could provide the goods necessary for an elaborate wedding, the 547 547 ceremony usually consisted simply of the man and woman living together. In theory, this prevented the children from ever obtaining a name or other prerogative included in the ancestral myth of the first-born parent, and no effort was always made to conceal from them the details of the ancestral family's origin myth. But, as already described in the section dealing with slaves, the expenditure of valuable presents served to ameliorate, or at least to cover, the blot. If the child succeeded in giving many potlatches, the stain was generally forgotten. On the other hand, if the child of a slave married to a free man was not "washed," he could always be shamed by a reminder of the disgrace of his parents' wedding.

In case of murder, the son or other near relative of the victim sometimes accepts a daughter or other member of the offender's family instead of exacting blood revenge. The bride is delivered to her husband with valuable goods "to wash away the blood," but these never suffice entirely to remove the disgrace from her or her children. The latter may inherit names and prerogatives from their father, but even if they attain to the position of chiefs, they can always be put to shame by reference to their mother's marriage as an atonement for murder. Of course the influence of a great chief makes it impolitic to refer to his ancestry, and there are a few instances of men having reached such a position of eminence that the blot has been practically forgotten. The wife's family must continue to give presents to the husband for years after marriage, otherwise her lot is unenviable indeed, and her children have the status of the unwanted offspring of a slave and a free man. In some cases a marriage of this type is entered upon years after a murder, if a son or other descendant wishes to end the anxiety of constantly expecting blood revenge.

REPURCHASE OF THE WIFE

556 556 Repurchase of a wife is the necessary consequence of every 558 558 respectable Bella Coola marriage. It is assumed that the pre-

whenever, and as often as X gives a potlatch, Y's relatives are expected to ransom her from her husband. Although this is the expression used by the Bella Coola, it has only a ceremonial significance, since Y remains X's wife.

Whenever X intimates that he is going to give a potlatch, Y and her relatives begin to hoard goods irrespective of whether or not children have been born. Their value is unregulated by custom, although the individuals concerned always try to give as much as they can; usually X does not know exactly how much will be provided until their actual delivery. Moreover, this is the occasion most preferred by the relatives of a wife to present to her husband ancestral names or other prerogatives embodied in origin myths. The exact rights of X with respect to such gifts have already been defined so need not be repeated here. Even if Y has taken an ancient name to her husband when she was married, she may bring him another when repurchased. This is an event of even greater importance to a woman than marriage, so no effort is spared to add to the dignity of the occasion.

On the second night of a potlatch Y's father announces what prerogatives he proposes to grant to X. These may include the 556
right to a certain totem-pole design, the carving of a spoon, a 513 painting for the wall of the house, or any other element embodied in the origin myth. These privileges are displayed by X at the coming potlatch. If, as is usual, Y's father wishes to give his son-in-law an ancestral name, it is announced on this occasion, and is the designation by which X is known during the ceremony. It is always said that such a name is so "heavy," in the sense of "so important" that it must be "dragged across" to her husband by Y. Karlar names are commonly transferred [553] as presents, but without any public bestowal, and one or two instances are known of the similar acquisition of xaxaal prerogatives and whistles; it was in this way that Pathe was able to import xaxaal ritual from Bella Bella. After announcing the

583 opportunity of stating that he wishes to hunt on X's hunting-
[425] grounds, or fish in his fishing-grounds. Permission is never refused, though it is only for the period of the potlatch. Since Y's father is to assist X, it is considered fitting to grant him facilities for obtaining pelts and food.

It is on the afternoon of the second day of the potlatch that the goods are delivered. They serve six purposes, which can be described separately, although the Bella Coola usually think of them as being too closely associated for division.

(1) They increase the dignity, influence, and prestige of the donors. This theme needs no further elaboration. When X later gives these presents to his foreign guests, he announces the person from whom he has received them and in this way knowledge of the manner in which Y's relatives have upheld the dignity of the marriage is spread far and wide, to their intense gratification.

(2) They help X to rise to a position of influence in the community by the credit which comes to him from their large distribution. Though a man may acquire goods in various ways, the Bella Coola affirm that without contributions from his wife's relatives no man can become a chief.

(3) They validate the transmission of names, or other prerogatives, taken by Y to her husband. Even presents given [606] directly from father-in-law to son-in-law are always said to have been taken by the daughter to her husband.

(4) Indirectly, they increase the prestige of the children,
[554] either born at that time or who may appear later. None of the goods used for repurchasing their mother can actually be used for their benefit, but the whole rite gives them strength to succeed in life. A child whose mother has not been repurchased is said to be unable to walk, as if his legs were powerless; he lacks intelligence, and the ability to prosper. From the [578] petty quarrels of childhood until old age, a person is proud to recall the number of times his mother was rebought, and to thrust this statement in the teeth of those less fortunate.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948

(5) They govern Y's status in this world. When women quarrel, as they often do, the most common boast to shame a less wealthy rival is a reminder of the number of times the speaker was repurchased and the value of the goods used. 556 583 [578]

"I can sit down on fifteen canoes," or "I am carried by five slaves," says the angry woman, mentioning whatever goods were used for her repurchase.

(6) Finally, these goods serve a more definite purpose in obtaining for Y a name, or names, of which the value is directly proportionate to the expenditure, precisely as the importance of a chief's designation depends on the goods used to validate it. [553]

As with men's names, some women's appellations were given by Ālqantām to the first arrivals; others were created on this earth with regard to peculiar events, and still others are names which can be used either by men or women. Theoretically, the dignity of the first type of name is greater than either of the others, but in practice the importance of the owner depends on the number of times she has bought herself from her husband; the principles governing the rank of women are thus the same as those already described for men. The term yutsak, applied to a woman who has many times rebought herself and so reached a position of eminence, is the feminine equivalent to stāltumy. The creation of women's names in reference to personal characteristics or incidents connected with their married life is more common than similar creations for men. The ritual of the bestowal of a name on Y, here given, was omitted from the description of the potlatch in order to lessen the complexity of that ceremony. It will be remembered that on the afternoon of the second day of the potlatch Y's relatives appear outside X's house, carrying valuable presents. 551 556 583 [554] [562] 553 556 583

The announcer calls out that Y's father has come to give "food" to X and his relatives. By food, presents are meant, which are the return, with interest, of the gifts given by X's relatives on various occasions. The giver is announced, for other relatives than Y's father contribute, and to whom the

553 present is made. The recipient may either be X himself or
556 one of his relatives who has conferred a gift on one of Y's 583 family. The goods are taken inside, counted, displayed, and the same announcement made. These presents are given away by X the same evening, so that the only practical advantage that he receives is that the ultimate recipients make their returns, if any, to him. He makes no recompense to Y's relatives for these.

"Please, ye people, listen to my words. This is an important occasion, hearken to what I have to say. Long ago our first ancestors were married, as X and Y have been, and it is fitting that we should make the name ..... live again in Y. Three years [or as long as the name has been dormant] it has been dead, as if living with the ghosts beneath the earth. Now it shall stand up again in Y; henceforth we use it for her. Come forth ..... [using Y's new name], your father rebuys you from X for fifty blankets [for example]."

Y may be anywhere; the statement "come forth" is merely symbolical. The fifty blankets are piled outside the house and the spectators, of whom many have gathered to witness the transaction, know that that number of blankets has been given with reference to that name. In some cases the wife is rebought three, four, or even more times for one name, either repeatedly by her father, or successively by her father and other relatives, or several names may be acquired by the different repurchasings. For instance, at one potlatch not many years ago a woman obtained the names Lilikk, Xwulkw, Smaisi-a, and Ailsamka. As with men, some women prefer to have one very strong name, rather than diffuse their importance over a number. In this particular case the four designations were received from different relatives. At each repurchase the call is raised:

"Come forth ..... your brother [uncle, or whatever relative it may be] rebuys you from X for ....."

In one case where an orphan woman, without relatives, repurchased herself by her own arduous labours, the announcement was made: 553 554 553

"Y's belt has come to ransom her."

The reference was to the manner in which she had looped up her clothing with a belt when working. If Y's father should die after assuming goods to repurchase her, they are used for the purpose intended and the announcement is:

"Y's father's arms has come to ransom her."

The ancestral family descended from the first settlers at Swalk'ut have the prerogative of singing a special song as they ransom one of their daughters. This was used by their first ancestors on a like occasion. The theme is: [724] [553]

"I, I, I am the highest of you all. No one of you is capable of doing what I can accomplish. You all live on what I void."

The significance of this last sentence is that the village of Swalk'ut is farthest up the Bella Coola River. Its inhabitants used to claim that the people of the other villages lived on the refuse which they threw into the river, a source of pride to them. [78C]

After announcing the various relatives who have ransomed Y, the presents are counted and carried into X's house. The statement concerning their number, who has given them, and for what purpose, is repeated to the foreign guests there assembled, and they are then piled indiscriminately in a large heap for future distribution. At this juncture X calls out:

"Come in, come in," as though he were welcoming arrivals from a distance.

Y's relatives enter, and the ritual of the potlatch continues in the manner already described. The origin myth in which Y's new name is embodied is related in considerable detail, especially its recent history, that is, by whom it was last used and any pertinent items connected with its transmission. If she has received several names from different myths, each is similarly expounded.

As has been said, many women's names have been created 551 553

her husband's crime by taking this name for herself when she [552] [578]
[illegible] [illegible] from him.

Sirmu, "The Inhospitable One." The husband received this expulsion owing to his wife's manners, as she adversized what had been said about him.

Nagabhaktaka, "Unedifiedly Dead." This woman's mother-in-law claimed that she deliberately failed to hear when she was [546] told to do, and applied the above epithet to her. The daughter-in-law confounded her by taking it as her own name.

When a name of this type is assumed it is always announced [553] when, where, and for what purpose it was first assumed.

A description has already been given of the actual ritual [554] by which X borrows the goods acquired from the expulsion [553] of Y, but it is necessary to enlarge on the prohibition against their use for the direct benefit of one of the children of the couple. The theory is that the goods bind the marriage contract and express in a practical and lofty form the kindly sentiments with which Y's relatives regard her husband, and the bond between the two families, hence they must be used solely for the benefit of him and his relatives. A man usually applies these goods to initiate the children of his brothers or sisters into the ranks of the naual or factor. It is unthinkable for goods to be delivered without an expulsion of Y's family's glories, but if this should ever take place, there would be no difficulty in applying them to the direct benefit of her children. When used, for example, to make a child of X's brother a naual, he is a living testimony of the noble way in which Y's relatives have done that which is fitting for the family of her husband. Due to accidents in announcing and storing of presents, it sometimes happens that those obtained by the expul- [551] sion of Y are used for the benefit of her own children. Unless this error is corrected, the child could always be shamed by having it said:

"You are a mere nobody. The goods expended in the 556 583 [584] repurchase of your mother have become nothing beneath your feet."

When such an accident occurs, the relatives of Y take some future occasion to give presents to validate his child, with the announcement:

"The goods used from the repurchase of his mother have become nothing beneath his feet. We hereby supply that deficiency."

Thus it is demonstrated that the relatives of both parents are interested in his welfare, so that his path is clear before him.

583 556 583 Many women are only repurchased once, but an effort is made to do this frequently since the more times, the greater her prestige. After several repurchasings it is felt that the names and other prerogatives "dragged across" by Y have become valueless. But since new names have been taken to her husband on such occasion, the marks of friendship between the two families are still plain. Thus it is that these few transmitted can be revived by relatives of Y, unless, of course, X has validated them for his children. If there is only one repurchasing, the names remain the definite property of X. This is not a clearly formulated law, merely a statement that the earlier names have been covered by those later given, and that accordingly Y's relatives, having done what was proper, can now use the titles once more. There is a constant interchange of names and privileges between families related by marriage.

556 583 [182] It is virtually impossible to over-estimate the importance of this rite of repurchase among the Bella Coola, one of the few customs preserved tenaciously amid the ruins of their ancient culture. The writer was forcibly struck with the following instance which occurred while he was in Bella Coola:

About fifteen years before, a young man and woman had married with due formality. After three children had been born, the mother took to drink and vice until her husband at last repudiated her, retaining possession of the children. The woman, weakened by disease, divorced by her husband, and [586]

[illegible]

looked upon with contempt by her family, was yet determined that nothing she had done should ruin her children's chances in life. Accordingly she donated $500 to her ex-husband to enlarge himself. Marriage is accepted as a matter of course, but to be many times repurchased is the goal of every ambitious woman. In Fiji the custom prevails of depicting on the walls the number of coppers paid for repurchasing a wife. Thus her fame is displayed to all.

It is somewhat difficult for a white man to realize what a privilege the family of a wife considers it to repurchase her from her husband. If the latter is unwilling to give a potlatch, his relatives-in-law may urge him to do so, and if he still declines to court himself they take the drastic step of inviting their fellow-villagers to assemble in his house where, with these guests as witnesses, the wife's relatives give presents to her husband and his relations. They may make this presentation on any gathering when they are assured of a large audience. In so doing the donors have demonstrated their proper sentiments, in spite of the inertness of the husband.

The assistance which the relatives of a wife have given her husband in a manner about which they can boast for the rest of their lives, a fact impressed upon the writer by listening to a quarrel between two Bella Coola men. One of them owned a horse and waggon which the other had hired to move some goods. The latter became very angry, claiming that the former had overcharged him and must be poor and greedy to be so eager to acquire money. The teamster, thus deeply insulted, silenced the other man by reminding him that the only reason he was wealthy was by means of the goods used to repurchase his, the teamster's, sister from her husband, brother of the man with whom he was disputing. To the observer the dispute was made more interesting by the fact that both the husband and wife had been dead for at least fifteen years, but their families had not ceased to remember the financial obligations connected with the marriage.

A man who is giving a ceremony of any kind can offer few greater insults to his wife's relatives than omission to ask their assistance. The following is a good instance of such an insult.

About 1900 a man and woman were married and had three children. Then the mother died, before being repurchased from her husband. In addition, the husband had outlived his wife's father when one of his younger children had died; so that it was more fitting that the wife's relatives should contribute to any ceremony given by the husband. Four years later the husband proposed to marry once more, and to have the wedding occur at a potlatch. But on the day of ceremony, he insulted the relatives of his dead wife by failing to invite them. The cause of the feud was not disclosed, but the husband increased it by again failing to invite her family when, during the potlatch, they should have remembered her for the benefit of his young relatives about to be initiated into the ranks of the crowd. The father of the dead woman came forward uninvited with a large present for each, saying in effect:

"I, too, have a right to contribute to add prestige to my daughter and her children."

In this way he delivered the wife of his son-in-law who had hoped to shame his father-in-law by the failure of the latter to contribute to his potlatch. The son-in-law endeavoured to excuse himself by saying that his late wife's relatives had not existed for so long that he thought they would not wish to do so. This retort further incensed the father of the dead woman so that next day he and his wife publicly gave the donor of the potlatch $300 "to make clean where we sit."

This somewhat lengthy description has been necessary to explain the important part which the repurchase of wives plays in the lives of the Bella Coola; it is one of the fundamentals of society and is, therefore, worthy of attention.

DISSOLUTION OF MARRIAGE

[586]

Either death or divorce can terminate marriage. The decease of a wife is an unfortunate affair, quite apart from the grief which it may cause her husband. Two families have been brought into peculiarly close relations through her, and now the bond itself has snapped; delicate financial arrangements have been undertaken, and it is not easy to settle these without ill-feeling, particularly if the alliance was a return marriage. If no child has been born, and no repurchasing of the wife

One very old man is still, 1923, commonly called by this last designation, much to his annoyance.

When the songs had been sung, each accompanied by the dancing of the deserted husband, the donor of the ceremony distributed food and the guests departed. The only advantage to the giver of the rite was that it enabled him to show his wealth in an apparently disinterested fashion by gifts of food. Usually he was a friend of the aggrieved husband.

When a husband deserted his wife, the other women of the village used to perform an exactly similar ceremony. The same type of songs were composed, and during their singing the deserted wife used to dance, wearing above her head representations of a penis and testicles. By means of hidden strings she was able to cause the former to become erect.

On other occasions the ceremony was varied by an announcer asking the offended party about the appearance of the deserter. There followed a minute and highly coloured description about the unpleasantness of his genital organs, a description which was swiftly incorporated into the songs.

It can be taken as a matter of course that the above description is little more than an outline of the Bella Coola ceremony of shaming. In spite of its deficiencies, it is important, as evidence of the former sentiment with regard to divorce. Obscene though the ceremony must have been, both in acting and in the free use of personalities, it must have been a powerful deterrent to divorce.* Indeed it would be difficult to imagine a stronger one in a community where a man's position is judged by public opinion and where his greatest aversion is to public ridicule. It is unfortunate that we shall probably never know whether the rite was associated with chiefs or commoners.

CEREMONIAL MARRIAGE

Since marriage gains much of its importance from the complicated business transactions between the two families, with the usual side neglected, it is perhaps not surprising that the Bulu Creole carry out a ceremonial form entirely disconnected from marital rights. It is believed that such ceremonial marriages were performed by the first inhabitants of this earth, and that they have been customary ever since. A careful father or uncle always endeavours to arrange such a rite for a girl when she is two or three years of age. The relatives decide on some influential chief whom they would like to have as their daughter's fictitious husband, considering his wealth and prestige, but not his age. They interview the proposed bridegroom, who may consult his wife or other relatives before accepting, although he rarely refuses, as that would be an insult to the petitioners as well as a financial loss to himself. No period of engagement is necessary, as the wedding is arranged for the near future. Among important chiefs the ritual is identical with that of real marriage, though usually it is somewhat curtailed. The relatives of the bride welcome her husband and his relatives in their house and receive from him rather larger presents than they give; the same remark is made about it being the proper time to take the bride to her new home, and the husband and his party depart, without the girl. Presents of canoes or pirogues may likewise be transmitted. The two are now considered as married, although there is no necessity for husband and wife even to see one another; on the other hand, there is no reason for avoidance since the marriage is essentially a business affair and not a sexual one. Whenever the husband gives a potlatch or other ceremony, he is assisted by the relatives of his fictitious wife, sometimes to a greater extent than by the relatives of his real one. This ceremonial wedlock may last for three or four years, until the relatives of the wife rebuy her from her husband. On this occasion it is essential that he receive from the relations of his fictitious wife presents of greater value than he himself has given, otherwise she would be disgraced. Ceremonial marriage differs from real marriage in that one repurchasing terminates

*A similar rite was ceremonially carried out for unmarried mothers.

[illegible] is, although it is customary for the parents of a wife to exhibit [illegible] their wealth on several occasions.

What are the advantages of such an agreement to the two parties? The husband receives considerable satisfaction, both in actual goods and in ceremonial prerogatives. Moreover, his vanity is gratified by the desire shown by others to have him as husband of their daughters. The advantages to the wife are more difficult to describe. Financially, her relatives always lose, yet they consider that the prestige gained by their daughter as wife of a mighty chief fully compensates for their monetary loss. Accordingly, they take pains to have a daughter married several times before puberty, either simultaneously or [553] in succession. Thus there is a form of ceremonial polyandry existing in Bella Coola at the present day. No ceremonial [554] marriage takes place after puberty. In later years, when the wife grows up, married, and has children of her own, their status is increased materially by the pre-puberty marriages of their mother. They address her fictitious husband as "father," and his children as brother or sister, although there are no more prohibitions with regard to them. A chief sometimes arranges the bestowal of names or other prerogatives on the children of a fictitious co-wife, but such favours are too uncertain to provide a motive for the prevalence of the rite. Its value rests on the esteem attached to a woman whose relatives have shown their wealth and prowess by marrying her several times. When her children quarrel with their playfellows, it is common to hear one boast:

"I have three fathers. How many have you?"

[555] Occasionally the relatives of a fictitious bride are unable to provide the goods to repurchase her from her husband and the girl remains disgraced for life. In no circumstances has her husband any claims to marital rights with her, and in due course she can marry someone else; but it is never forgotten that she was not rebought from her husband. In 1916 a girl about four years of age was married to a man of sixty, who at the time gave her relatives $80 and a motor boat. She had 588 556 more object. Bella Coola financiers are always seeking to arrange such undertakings; the potlatch is the culminating point, but the same principle pervades their whole life.

It is to the advantage of the intending donor of a potlatch to become the fictitious husband of as many children as possible. Accordingly he sometimes takes the initial step, as is customary for the relatives of the husband in real marriage, but not in ceremonial. In such a case it is necessary for him to offer some inducement, perhaps in the form of one of the few women's names brought to earth in the beginning of time. He approaches a suitable father-in-law, suggesting that at a fictitious marriage he would be willing to give his wife a noble woman's name. If this is agreeable, the rite is carried out accordingly. The wife is in many cases a son of the person to [551] whom the proposal was made; he duly receives a woman's name, the only circumstance under which this is possible. The actual designation will probably be returned through many repurchasings, but the lucky has reached an enviable position. In later years he can always silence a person with whom he is quarrelling by saying:

556 608 858 Another business transaction of a similar nature is the giving of a small infant to an old person to "hold." This appears to be uncommon, and the only instance about which information was available occurred under the following circumstances:

A man and a woman were married with full ceremony and the best of feelings prevailed between the two families. The wife was several times rebought until she and her relatives had fully maintained their dignity, in fact the relations of the husband felt that they were being out-shone. Then the wife's father died. To mark their sympathy, the husband's family gave the widow one of her daughter's children to "hold." Valuable non-returnable presents were transmitted as "soft blankets" for the child. The advantages to the donors were that they had an opportunity of showing their dignity, and it would always be a mark of pride for the child to be able to boast of the way in which she had been "held." 556 628 658

Ceremonial marriage clearly demonstrates two strong Bella Coola characteristics; namely, the desire publicly to enter into financial undertakings to demonstrate the wealth of the contracting party, and the desire to increase the prestige of children by means of this wealth expended indirectly on their behalf.

EXTRA-MARITAL RELATIONS

Although the Bella Coola do not regard marriage primarily as a means of regulating relations between the sexes, yet the connection between the two is sufficiently close to warrant description in this chapter. A man considers intercourse as one of the normal phenomena of life: by marrying he has exclusive rights to his wife, but few moral restraints deter him from anyone else to whom he can gain access without infringing the prerogatives of some other husband. Moreover, sexual intercourse is not regarded solely as a gratification of desires; it has a significance which can be described, not inaptly, as holy. As already explained, two favourite methods of obtaining success in any undertaking are by preserving lengthy continence or by observing ceremonial chastity. If a young unmarried man or widower should wish to make use of this latter means, he is compelled to have relations with a woman to whom he has no just claims. This is universally recognized, nor is there the slightest odium attached to the man. The only essential is that he neither violate another's wife, nor force a young girl against her will. 581 831 837

At the present time there is great laxity in Bella Coola, a condition which makes it difficult to judge the state of affairs in former times. Every effort was made to obtain satisfactory evidence, and the following was verified and re-verified with the older men. [128]

to force his attentions on a slave woman if she objected, although her refusal would be most unusual on account of his prestige. There were no professional prostitutes; a man usually gave a small present to a girl from whom he had received favours, and she was expected to give him a little, dainty basket filled with analysed cedar-bark to use as a sponge. Such relations appear always to have been of common occurrence. Today, as formerly, a man's morality is considered to be his own affair; laxity may lower his prestige, but no law is broken, and his neighbours laugh and chaff him about it. In fact, sexual matters are discussed with the greatest freedom, and a person who has been caught in mischief merrilously. When visiting a foreign tribe, a man sometimes lives with a woman and, on parting, composes and sings a song describing her charms. One man did this after living with a Kitlobo woman, and on his return to Bella Coola found that some of his fellows had learnt it in some unexplained manner; they used to sing it to him, much to their amusement, in part to his own, and somewhat to the annoyance of his wife. This perhaps illustrates rather clearly the attitude of the Bella Coola to an infraction of morality—where no marriage rite has been broken; it is amusing rather than disgusting. There are no times when the moral code ceases to function. At potlatches, and also at kuxiut dances, there appears always to have been a certain amount of laxity, although this was strictly prohibited within the house where the ceremony was taking place. Such behaviour is due to the excitement and stimulus of a large gathering, not to anything connected with the rites themselves.

Perverted sexual desires, like other matters connected with the relations of the sexes, are regarded as concerning the individual alone. Sodomy appears to be unknown. Intercourse by pre-adolescents is held to be disgusting, but carries with it no social ostracism. Incestuous union, however, is mildly anti-social; it exposes the offender to secret contempt, but does not interfere with his attainment of whatever position his wealth and influence may have sent for him. One or two instances are known of contact between parent and child, a matter in which it is the duty of no one to interfere; if a person thus flouts public opinion, it is his own affair.

In view of the firmness of the marriage bond and the absence of professional prostitutes, it is difficult to explain the wholesale exodus of Bella Coola women to Victoria in the last century. In some peculiar manner this came to be regarded as socially proper. The daughters both of chiefs and commoners trooped off for a varying period of months or years and those who returned brought back venereal diseases which appear to have been unknown before that date. Few of these bore children afterwards, a factor of prime importance in estimating the reasons for the decline of the Bella Coola. The motives which led the women to the city seem to have been: (a) the desire for wealth; (b) the influence of strong liquor; (c) the lure of a strange environment; (d) the attraction of the white men, on account of their higher culture.

It is fortunate for the Bella Coola that this fatal custom has ceased to be considered estimable, although the harm already done may be irremediable.

[764] while the relatives are preparing the body for disposal. For a child, these services are performed by the parents; for a married man whose parents are dead, by his brothers and other kindred; for a married woman, by her husband or the members of her own family. If she has borne no children, it is customary for her relatives to carry out the funeral rites, especially if she has been many times rebought from her husband. If such a payment has not been made, it is considered correct for a husband to bury his wife, although it is a point of honour for her relatives to reimburse him later for his expenditure. On the other hand, where children have been born and financial assistance mutually given and received several times, it is proper for the husband to perform the funeral rites, although he may receive assistance from his wife's kinsmen. There is no rigid ruling on the point, but bickerings seldom occur in connection with disposal of the dead. Members of the ancestral family are ready to assist in every case, both on account of the disgrace that would follow a niggardly funeral, and also as a means of displaying their wealth.

The first essential is to wash the body, a rite performed by men for a man, by women for a woman. It is immaterial who does this though some of the relatives usually volunteer. Neither husband nor wife touches a dead consort, though it is said that long ago a man would hold intercourse with a deceased wife to indicate his excessive grief. The most influential member of the immediate family takes the lead in the various necessary acts, although there is always endless discussion and advice from members of the ancestral family and others interested. A nose-ring is placed in the septum of the corpse; if this is omitted, the body will not be able to dissolve into its elements but will range the earth as a walking phantom, causing injury to anyone who observes it. If the deceased has just eaten some of the first run of spring salmon or oolachen, a shaman washes out his mouth with a sponge of undyed cedar-bark which he throws into the river. The essence of the salmon is thus extracted from the body; if the hole in the roof, ponderously and slowly, until its taboo 575 grip the "body." In the same gradual fashion it carries this 766 upwards until, just before the burden disappears through the roof, one of the principal singers leads his fellows and the audience in calling out:

"Ya-," which has the significance of, "May you have a safe passage whence you came and whither you are going."

As soon as the bird has disappeared, its notes are heard from above, growing gradually fainter as the actors blow their whistles less violently. An eloquent sisaak stands up and expounds how the deceased's crest has come down from above to carry away his body, and often mentions incidents in the ancestral myth to explain why this bird had appeared. A young man is sent up to replace the roof boards and the hidden accomplices rejoin the audience unostentatiously. The corpse itself remains hidden in some back corner of the house where it was concealed at the time the dummy was seized, so that nothing indicates what has taken place.

The relatives must give presents to all who have witnessed this ceremonial prerogative. These are now distributed without regard to the rank of the recipient; such gifts are not returnable and are said to be, "What Has Been Shaken Off," like dust from the departing body. A meal, likewise provided by the kinsmen of the deceased, is next served, and as the people are eating, it is customary for senior sisaak to make laudatory speeches, extolling the dead chief and comforting the survivors by reminding them of the way in which he will be looked after in virtue of his ancestral traditions. This procedure may continue for several hours, and it is only when no one else wishes to speak that the people disperse. [552] [537]

It is not easy to comprehend the attitude of the Bella Coola to this rite. Some influential sisaak state emphatically that in former days it was possible to carry it out so realistically that the uninitiated were deceived, and never suspected that the actual corpse was later on buried in secret by the singers, carpenters, and sisaak. On the other hand, those who do not 575 766 781

Indeed, a grave is never 965 disturbed except, rarely, when it is necessary to obtain a [989] portion of a skeleton for magical purposes. In such a case, the coffin lid must be lifted up on the side away from the [961] opener, so that he looks within over its upturned edge. A person failing to obey this injunction will soon die.

968 Burning or deposition near the grave is not restricted to the actual utensils and artifacts of the deceased. There, too, must be laid dried salmon which a man has smoked for winter use, as well as pulverized berries and other foods made ready [984] by a woman; to eat food prepared by a dead person seems indescribably indecent. In recent years, the crop, if a man dies after tilling and hoeing a field, is allowed to ripen, and then rot unharvested. So, too, the canoe in which a body has been brought home must be destroyed. The Bella Coola are not always able to state reasons for these actions, but it is [961] apparent that the underlying sentiment is that the taboo of [984] death lies upon any object prepared by the deceased, or that has been in contact with a corpse.

964 The rituals described above may be considered as religious in nature; almost equally important are the social require-431 ments of paying those who have assisted at a funeral. This 556 indebtedness falls on the near relatives, though all members [614] of the ancestral family are obligated in a somewhat indefinite manner. If a canoe has been destroyed that did not belong to the deceased, the owner must be recompensed. Presents must be given to the pall-bearers, to the woman who bore the flaming bark, to the grave-diggers, to those who delivered laudatory orations, and to all others who assisted in any way.
Failure to do so brands the relatives as miners with little respect for the deceased; lavish recompense shows that they have the outlook and minds of chiefs. Consequently, even poor people try to give as generous rewards as possible, both for their own sakes and out of respect to the dead person. Unfortunately, it was impossible to obtain details of the ceremony at which this takes place. The increase in wealth in recent years has made it possible to give memorial potlatches soon after death and recompense to funeral assistants is usually deferred until that time. Such was often true even in former years, although poor people used to call their fellow-villagers together for the express purpose of publicly rewarding those who had helped to bury one of their relatives. It is probable that a ceremony of this kind was of a simple type. Another expedient is, and was, to give gifts to the grave-diggers and others at any convenient ceremony, such as a non-sacred sisaok dance. As repeatedly mentioned, when the people have been called together for a ceremony, advantage is often taken of the gathering to settle debts or to perform rites of an entirely different nature. It is probable that the summoning of guests solely to witness the payment of helpers was always unusual; at present it never occurs. On those occasions when a body was buried in secret after the carrying away of a dummy figure by the crest, the goods of the deceased were deposited as usual in the cemetery. Those who carried them were the ones who had performed the secret interment, and when publicly recompensed for taking articles to the grave it was possible to increase the value of the gifts as reward for the hidden rite without exposing the subterfuge.

Another type of ceremonial taking place after a funeral is the cleansing from the contamination of death of near relatives of the deceased, and of those who have handled the corpse. If spring salmon or olachen are running, pall-bearers must not go near the river for ten days, or twenty according to some informants, after taking a body to the grave. They have become tainted with ceremonial uncleanness which, if brought to the river bank, would poison the salmon. Unwillingness to become affected in this way led, on at least one occasion, to an elderly, friendless slave being carried out to the cemetery by some old women who covered him with boards. The taint on grave-diggers cannot be removed, but automatically lapses after ten days.

The individual in greatest danger is the husband or wife whose consort has passed away. It is believed that Sa-lma

995 one of the several crests which it is believed he has become. The point does not appear important to the Bella Coola, corresponding to their indefinite ideas concerning whether the spirit and the life have become a single being, or several.

Knowledge of the life led in Nuxmáx-a by the deceased, now in the form of his crest,* is most indefinite. In a general way it is felt that the actions of this being are similar to those carried on during life, but in a more advanced degree. A skilled carpenter is a better carpenter in the land above, a chief who has given many potlatches below can give more in Nuxmáx-a. This [598] belief finds expression in mourning songs which frequently state how Alqunúm has called a good carpenter to work above, or how a chief has gone to exhibit his generosity in a new sphere. It is doubtful whether this sentiment plays any real part in Bella Coola thought. The spirit and the life of a dead person have gone too far away to affect the living; what little is known of their actions has been handed down from the distant past and is merely a matter of history. The only time that these 995 two merged elements come to this world is at a memorial pot- 969 latch, and formerly the uninitiated undoubtedly believed that 556 they were witnessing such a visit. Though the spectators were shown as a matter of course that the spirit and the life had become bird or animal, emphasis was laid on the fact that they had become the particular bird or animal crest of the donor's ancestral family. The effect of the memorial potlatch in former times, as at present, was, therefore, social rather than religious. Besides, the two parts portrayed have never been known 995 to affect a human being; they expect no offerings, grant no assistance, cause no injury, and are accordingly neglected.

In comparison with the above vague beliefs, Bella Coola information concerning ghosts is clear and exact. As already [993] *It is accepted that men were created as human beings, and only assumed bird or animal shapes in order to reach the earth, but there is no corresponding belief that the spirit and the life change back from crest to human form on arrival above. Of course the performance of human activities by zoomorphic creatures presents no difficulties in Bella Coola thought.

Supernatural good fortune has also been obtained from the "Mothers" of certain plants. 777

Among the roots that are sought for when a man intends to give a potlatch are those of clover and of oéál, a grass which grows on flats near the sea. Once the aunt of an elderly (in 1923) Bella Coola woman dug up the Mother of Oéál, a root, thick as her thumb, but shaped like a woman. Perhaps the reason that she found it was because she was digging in the darkness, after the setting of the sun. The woman, ignorant of the proper procedure, did nothing, with the result that her hands became painfully swollen. If she had wrapped the root in a portion of her used clothing and kept it hidden for one year, without saying anything about her find, it would have brought her supernatural good luck.

824 [556] [53]

Another woman found an elderberry as large as a baseball, and shaped like the mask worn above the forehead by a member of the nusaé society. Her father, an old man skilled in such matters, wrapped the berry in his daughter's soiled clothing and kept it carefully hidden in her box. It brought her supernatural good luck because, no matter how much or how often she gave away presents, goods always came to her.

SUPERNATURAL GOOD LUCK FROM STONES

Stones are among the objects from which supernatural good luck can be obtained. A person who has long observed ceremonial chastity may be fortunate enough to hear what seems to be the weeping of a new-born infant, as he passes in his canoe beneath some steep ocean cliff. Then, if he watches, he will see a stone being born from a larger one at the level of the sea. If the observer takes the infant-stone, wraps it in his soiled clothing and stores it among his possessions, it will act as other bringers of supernatural good fortune by luring all kinds of valuables to the owner. In fact, such a stone is said to be so potent that if left in an empty box for some time, it will attract enough skins to fill the receptacle.

Sxiaxl. It is said that many Rivers Inlet shamans have received their powers from this creature, which is accordingly well known to the Bella Coola in this connection, although few of their own people are said to have been benefited by it. 756* 787*

Since all animals are supernatural, it follows that any of them can cure the sick. Instances are remembered of this, in which the patient received a name differing slightly from that of his animal benefactor. Salmon, especially cohoes and early spring salmon, are extremely potent curers and many sick people have received aid from them. It is recognized that the former are uncanny since they have the ability to hide themselves in insignificant streams. One man was cured by a tree which gave him a yodel-like shaman's song, imitating the creaking and waving of its branches. More often, however, a supernatural animal merely speaks to a man without making him a shaman. [825] [533]

Two courses are open to the patient who has been cured by such a visitation. He may at once proclaim his powers, or he may say nothing about them in the hope of obtaining further revelations and further names. From a single experience he has received a certain amount of power, but the more he has, the greater this will be. If he decides not to wait, he at once calls the singers and repeats to them the words and tunes of the songs he has received. When later on he gives presents to validate his shamanistic name, it becomes publicly recognized [553] [556]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

* 756 that he is a shaman, and his future status depends on his
* 787 success in curing those who appeal to him. If the man decides [553] not to make use of his experience, he must not mention the
[556] name of his apparition, as to do so would not only prevent further benefits, but would cause the return of the disease from which he had been suffering. Some shamans have waited until they have received three or four separate visitations, acquiring a name at each; and a Bella Bella man was known to have had ten. Whether or not it is wise at once to display shaman's power is a matter on which there is no general agreement. On the one hand by long, and perhaps fruitless, waiting, a man postpones the social esteem which would have been his if he had at once displayed his prowess, gambling with his chances of receiving still greater gifts. While awaiting further visitations, a man may be able to make use of the power already received, although he cannot do so formally as an accredited shaman. Thus one man, who long ago was visited by a supernatural being, but has made no public claim of his apparition,
[755] is able to cure stomach-ache among his own grandchildren by massaging the stomach as if to force something from it, and then puffing this something, four times, from his spread hands. Still hoping for power, he declined to say by which supernatural being he had been visited.

The following account was obtained from one of the few old Bella Coola who claim to have had shamanistic experiences. It describes what is done when the patient decides not to wait for further revelations:

When comparatively young, the informant slept one night in the forest with a companion. On awakening the following morning, they found a trail of dried blood leading to their blankets. They examined themselves and found no wound, so concluded that the blood could not be their own, and, therefore, was a mystery, over which they worried for a few days but then forgot. About a week later, the narrator of the incident dreamed that a strange creature came to him; he did not know what it was, but it terrified him. A few minutes later

* 756 and heard her utter the name that was to be his, as a shaman,
* 787 Nitsumdimut. He began to shake his hands as if dancing, for he was too feeble to do more, and began to sing the song. His mother at once called in the singers who listened, learning it for future use. The man is firmly convinced that if his mother had not thus called in the singers so speedily he would, after four days, have received another vision, and with it real shamanistic power. As it is, he is a shaman, since he was cured when at the point of death by Ṭlitcäplilän-a and received a name and song from her, but he is unable himself to effect cures. As soon as the singers had departed, his mother at once began to make for him a collar formed of alternate bands of dyed, and
[553] family distributed presents, thus validating his shamanistic
[552] name. Such presents are not returnable; "they have become nothing" for the designation. Thus accredited, a shaman is in a position to start curing, if his song has contained a reference to a basin, otherwise, as in the present case, he is merely a shaman in a social sense, not professionally. There is thought to be actually within the new shaman's body, some peculiar
[841] warning to menstruating women and others who are unclean to remain at a distance, and he spends much of his time alone in the forest. This continues until the next kusiut dance season when the coming to him of a yax (II, p. 6) frees him from restraint, since the one supernatural power drives out the other. If the shaman himself is unwilling to have a yax, it is sufficient if one comes to a son, or other near relative.

A shaman who has been told by his supernatural visitor to use a basin instructs a carpenter to make one for him. The design depends either on the owner's wish, or on that of his benefactor if the latter has decreed specifically.

955 to the part affected. In such a case the object, a toad for
* 756 example, becomes visible at the end of the staff. Conjuring is employed to do this, and often a tuft of dyed cedar-bark is used, which makes the deception still easier. Shamans are very expert in such matters. It is said that when two rival shamans once disputed about their prowess, one of them cast his stick on the ground and it became a snake, whereupon the other did likewise; and his became a toad which hopped after the snake. The Bella Coola find biblical parallels for such [177] revelations of power in the transformation of Aaron's rod, and the appearance of fire on Mount Carmel.

Shamanistic Ceremonies

554 In addition to his professional abilities, a shaman has also
* 756 certain social prerogatives. As has been mentioned, many shamans lack the power to cure, but they may have seen some 787 feat during a dream, or during a visitation from Thicăplilăn-a. It enhances a man's social prestige if he can graphically display whatever he has observed. It follows that the rites about to be described are often, perhaps usually, performed by a person unable to cure the sick, but it must be remembered that to the Bella Coola there is no social difference between a shaman who can cure with the aid of a basin, and one who lacks this power. Each has merely received a different gift from his supernatural benefactor. There seems little doubt that a man of imagina-
* 756 tive temperament frequently invents a feat of this type, or rather that he ponders over one until he either dreams of it,
787 or imagines himself to have done so. Certainly, after he has performed such a rite, he deludes himself into believing that he has had supernatural authorization for it. Conjuring feats performed long ago by shamans, feats practised by the members of other tribes, personal inventions, either actually or theoretically dreamed of, all these are among the sources from which shamanistic dances are derived. It follows that almost
* 956 anyone who has the necessary skill is able to perform, provided that he has sufficient food to validate the ceremony. Thus this 556

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE5 Bellacoola NE5

type of dance differs from all other Bella Coola ones, since no inherited prerogative is required. Years ago such exhibitions were common, although curing shamans were rare. 756 556

The usual time for a shaman's performance is at the conclusion of the kusiut season, though one is sometimes held prior to that period if the would-be performer fears that the food which he has stored up for the event is likely to be frozen. [796]

When he decides to give a dance, the shaman first summons the singers to his house and teaches them a song of his own composition. Theoretically both text and tune should have been received from his supernatural benefactor, but many performers undoubtedly employ songs used by shaman ancestors which they have chanced to remember. Another device is to describe a supernatural being seen in a dream.[1] In some cases there is deliberate deception, but in most the performer persuades himself that he has received supernatural authorization. The texts are full of obscure allusions, a river, for example, is spoken of as swift running water. Often a man will treasure a song for years, before collecting the wealth necessary to use it publicly, with the social prestige attached. A shaman always obtains a name from his supernatural benefactor, but if a man merely uses a feat observed in a dream, this is impossible, so he adopts the designation of some deceased shaman, soon convincing himself that it was uttered by the apparition. Others will probably remember this name, hence suspicions may easily be aroused concerning the authenticity of the performance, but it is not customary to voice these. The singers repeat the song which they have just heard, and continue doing so until they have mastered it. Sometimes they compose further songs themselves for the performer. During the practising, those who are not kukusiut are expelled from the house. A shaman is a person who has come in contact with the supernatural; hence he is akin to the members of the society who, therefore, support him during his rite.[1] A herald is sent out

[1] Theoretically, a shaman need not be a kusiut, but visitations usually come only to those of religious and imaginative temperaments, who are in the majority of cases already members of the society.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948

to make known to all that there will be a dance on the following day, using the name of the shaman. After such announcement, it would be most unusual for anyone to think of leaving a village until after the performance.

Towards dusk on the appointed day the people are summoned to the house of the shaman. Near the door are seated those who are not initiated kukusiut; in the inner part of the house are members of the society, with the singers in their accustomed places behind the fire. The shaman stands alone between the fire and the door and sings one of his songs, the time being marked by the words alone. Then he dances, his wrists shaking, his head rolling from side to side, and his feet marking time to the beating of sticks, as the singers accompany the singing of his song. If more than one song has been composed he dances to each, always accompanied by other shamans and by them alone. The shaman's costume consists of the usual blanket, and eagle down is scattered in his hair, with the additional and distinctive mark of intertwined dyed, and undyed, cedar-bark. After every song, the singers beat time very rapidly,[1] too rapidly for the dancer to keep pace with it, so he merely sways backwards and forwards shaking his hands violently. Then the shaman, assisted by a few friends whom he has chosen for the purpose, performs a conjuring feat to impress the uninitiated. The kukusiut realize that this may be merely a deception, but since real shamans perform something of the same nature, there is always the possibility that it may be genuine. The shaman may choose some feat which he has seen some old shaman perform, or he may use something which he has seen in a dream; or rely purely on his own inventive ability, aided, as he always is, by carpenters. The method of carrying out each trick is carefully guarded, with the result that it was impossible to obtain information about more than a few. After the conjuring act, the shaman gives food to all, followed by presents. If it is the first time that he has given

[1] This fast beating of time is called ahl; it occurs only in shaman and nusuk dances.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

such a ceremony, that is, if he is validating his name, the gifts must be valuable. On later occasions, irrespective of whether it is the same trick or another that is performed, the presents will be of small value. Goods so given are not returnable. After dancing, a shaman wears his collar of dyed and undyed cedar-bark all summer, in fact until he rids himself of his supernatural endowment by the performance of a kusiut rite the following winter. 756 * 556 ● [292]

Thus there is close inter-dependence of shaman and kusiut dances. On any later occasion, at a ceremony when songs of all types are being sung, if the singers beat out the tunes of those used at the ritual just described, the shaman dances to them. This is said to "cure" him, as if the power within him was a source of danger. [575] [533] [535]

The following are examples of the conjuring tricks performed, most of them done by the shaman Ninitsamlaix, a relative of an informant, who was able to learn the methods employed. 756 * 789

On one occasion Ninitsamlaix prepared two boxes, apparently the ordinary wooden sort used for cooking; across each he arranged a diagonal cross-piece so that the receptacle contained two watertight compartments. Previous to the performance, Ninitsamlaix poured water, dyed red with the bark of the alder, into one section of one of the boxes, and put eagle down in one of the compartments of the other. When the time came to carry out the rite he asked an accomplice, another shaman, to bring some water and pour it into his box. This was done, the assistant taking care to put it into the empty half, not into that which contained the dyed water. Ninitsamlaix shook the box and poured out some of the liquid to prove that it really was water, and then drank. The spectators, unaware of the cross-piece, did not notice that he did so from the corner opposite to that from which he had poured the water. He had, of course, drunk the dyed fluid. Ninitsamlaix cried out that what he had swallowed was paining him, and proceeded to vomit the red water, much to the surprise of the

them renders it more likely that they will grant his requests. Therefore, a shaman is usually called upon to perform the following rites: 756* 782

(1) Washing the mouth of a person who has died without voiding from his body the first salmon or olachen of the season (I, p. 436). [764]

(2) Asking assistance for the complicated rites of the potlatch (I, p. 192). [556]

(3) Request for assistance before starting on a journey, by puffing eagle down into the air (I, p. 106). [484]

(4) Request for aid by means of placing food on the water and blowing eagle down into the air at Mesatche Nose and Kwatna (I, p. 109).

In fact a supplication to any supernatural being can be made with greater prospect of success by a shaman than by any other person.

The Power of Shamans

As has been said, a shaman actually has power within himself, and this is so strong that it may be a source of danger to others. If a man should pass behind one so endowed when the latter is eating, his spirit would be drawn from his body into the shaman's mouth, which would close with a click, crushing the spirit and killing the man. This is quite involuntary on the part of the shaman. It happened more than once among the early inhabitants, and since that time people have been very careful not to pass behind an eating shaman; this taboo was still in force until about 1885. A shaman, too, is said to be able to recall a spirit which has left its body, and thus caused illness. It is believed by some that shamans can see the position of a person's tally post, and so judge the length of his life. These examples show the varying beliefs of different Bella Coola concerning the powers of shamans. 756* [761] [264] [178] [755]

But the force within the shaman is really more dangerous to its possessor than to others. As certain "unclean" objects are able to subdue supernatural beings, so do these same ob- 756* 783 841

shaman pours the grease on the central fire, and throws on it 755 also the figures and some dried salmon. Thus propitiated, it 782 is believed that the dead will be more likely to allow the sickness to be sucked forth.

Shamans from the dead perform conjuring feats and 756 * dramatic performances of the same type as ordinary shamans. 556 Until he gives his first dance a newly created shaman is known as a lsix, the same word that is used for a kusiut initiate, and [575] during this period he wears the shaman's collar of intertwined dyed and undyed cedar-bark. If he is wealthy and influential, a shaman will repeat his dance every fourth year. Such a per- [796] formance can be held at any season, although the usual time is after the kusiut ceremonies. The dramatic representations are of scenes witnessed in the land below, though sometimes they are done in a reverse manner, following the practice of the dead in doing things strangely. Thus one shaman reported that the ghosts wore very long blankets, but when he danced he wore one that came only to his hips. The method of singing is the same as that employed by ordinary shamans, but one whose [535] power is derived from the dead dances with head bent downwards, his free hand pointing to the ground with first finger extended. Also his cry of "xwai, xwai, xwai," uttered at intervals with a deep cadence, differs from that used by ordinary shamans. A dance always terminates with the distribution of food to validate the ceremony.

Like ordinary shamans, those from the dead cannot trans- 756 * mit their power. At death their songs too are lost, unless they 533 choose to give them to a friend who is also a shaman from the [428] dead. This is obviously contrary to the theoretical belief that all songs have been obtained during revelations, but is not at all contrary to the Bella Coola practice of having the singers assist the visionaries in "remembering" their visions.

The following tale, although drawn from the distant past, 539 is a typical illustration of one of the many ways in which 756 * shamanistic power is received from the dead.[8] 775

[8] A few stories of similar type have been included in vol. I, chap. VIII to explain the life of the dead, and others are grouped together in the next chapter.

branches, and again threw the stone. This time the man was able to hurl it back the full distance. 539 *

The washing had made him strong as a grizzly bear, lithe and handsome, and had also given him the ability to see supernatural beings when concealed from the eyes of ordinary mortals. This last accomplishment was due to his having been made so clean by the expulsion of all the filth from his body that the supernatural ones had no aversion to being seen by him. After the cleansing, the man returned to his village, where he soon entered into an argument with two of the people who had been unkind to him. They quarrelled and the man seized his enemies and pulled their arms from their bodies. The parents of the injured men were angry and wished to take revenge on the assailant, but were prevented by friends who pointed out that the punishment given to their sons was well warranted. 787 *

THE LAD WHO VISITED THE HOME OF THE FISH

Long, long ago, there lived a lad who was so poor that all he had for clothing was a rough goat-skin blanket. He was so miserable and friendless that he made up his mind to commit suicide. The ice was breaking in the Bella Coola River at the time, and large cakes were floating down to the sea. The lad leaped out upon one block, then sprang to another, and finally into a clear patch of water. Associates seeking to dissuade him had followed him from one cake of ice to another, but they drew back when he plunged into the cold water.

The youth was not drowned. He found a road under the water which led him to the land of the herring; then, still following the path, he passed in succession the countries of the olachen, the steel-head salmon, the spring salmon, the sockeye salmon, the hump-back salmon, the dog salmon, and lastly the cohoe. Each kind of fish dwelt in its own country, the cohoe salmon, being the last to reach the Bella Coola River, living at the greatest distance from it. Not long after his arrival in the land of the fish, the salmon boat, Nuskymm, left for Bella Coola and on it the youth returned home. Owing to this experience he became in time both wealthy and famous.

THE SUCCESSFUL SEALER

Long, long ago, a man living at Sunxl failed to display the generosity expected of him as a chief. He showed no initiative or pride, accepting what was given him without demur, and doing nothing to uphold the dignity of his ancestral home. Whenever a feast was given, this man's share was thrown down so clumsily before him that he was spattered with the food, but he was too lethargic even to show resentment. His four 539 * 787 * 556 ●

* 534 * 787 sons, of whom the eldest was about sixteen, though old enough to appreciate the slights put upon their father, could do nothing to defend him.

On a winter day one of these lads felt impelled to follow a trail down the north side of the Bella Coola valley along the edge of salt water. [556] The weather had been cold for some time, but on this day it was so warm that he lay down to doze on the warm rocks. Near his head was a small opening which connected with a long passage to the ocean, and through this he presently heard the hoarse breathing of sleeping seals. His hunting desires aroused, he went to the edge of the steep crag overlooking the sea and dived in. He bravely penetrated into a narrow passage which led him under the rocks, until with his last gasp he emerged into a cave where there were countless seals. Waiting only a moment, and without disturbing the animals, he dived back through the passage safely.

[411] When he reached home the lad said nothing about what he had seen, but that evening he began to make a seal-spear of the usual type with a wooden handle and a bone point. He asked his father to help him with this carpentry task, and his mother to make a rope for the harpoon-head. Though surprised at their son's energy, the parents did as he requested, but the fellow-villagers mocked at his efforts, for the lad was no hunter.

Next morning he asked his father to accompany him, and the two set off in a canoe, carrying the spear which had been made the previous evening. Before starting, the lad requested one of his brothers to have a fire ready for cooking the spoil that night. Father and son paddled to the entrance of the subterranean passage, though the old man was, of course, ignorant of its existence. The son told him to wait, and dived overboard, armed only with a club, for the seal-spear had really been unnecessary. He penetrated through the passage and at once killed a seal pup, born that year, with which he returned to the canoe. The lad explained nothing to his father, so that it seemed to the latter as if his son had dived down into the depths and there slain a seal, after remaining below for an amazingly long time.

When the two returned to the village they were greeted with a shriek of laughter at the small size of their quarry. In derision, the villagers took the pup from them and threw it from hand to hand, as if it had been a ball.

the people of his own village but those of two neighbouring towns. All accepted, as is customary, irrespective of the amount of food. The carcass was cut up and the guests received such minute portions that they became wildly hilarious over the meagre fare provided and flung many insulting remarks at their host. This was what the lad had planned. Confident of his ability to establish his good name, he desired to make his resurgence more striking by first emphasizing his degradation. 539* 787* 556

Next day the father and son again went hunting, and this time the lad killed a seal of slightly larger size. Once more he called in his neighbours and again they made sarcastic remarks about his poverty. The succeeding day he killed one large seal, and summoned the people. Next day he slew two seals; the next, four; then eight, sixteen, and thirty-two on successive days. Each evening a feast was held and the booty distributed. By this time contempt and scorn had been replaced by respectful wonder, and when the hunter returned with his canoe filled with seals everyone was able to eat to repletion. There was a surfeit of the highly esteemed flesh.

The next day the lad brought back his canoe filled with seals, and the same night the people gathered for the usual feast. Now was the time for which the youth had been waiting. When the carcasses had been cut up and cooked, ready for distribution, he made a speech, reminding those present of the manner in which his parents had been "dirtied," by food thrown at them during feasts, and how they had never actively resented it. Then he intimated that he was about to retaliate. Starting with the chiefs at the upper end of the house, he threw pieces of cooked seal at his guests, nor did he desist until the faces and chests of all had been well spattered with the grease. The people, realizing that it was their own rudeness which was being returned to them, could not defend themselves.

The successful sealer had had a second quantity of seal meat cooked in readiness, which he now distributed to his ruffled guests in a gracious manner. In this way he was able to refurbish the prestige of his family. By his lavish donations of seal meat on many occasions, he gained a reputation for generosity which was envied by all.[15]

tense throughout this chapter, and to assume the presence of a number of young men and women ignorant of the significance of the rites. Formerly, the kukusiut often had difficulty in impressing the uninitiated with their prowess, and feuds with the a'alt were common.

Although membership in the kusiut society depends on an ancestral prerogative, it is essentially a democratic institution. A certain amount of wealth is necessary to validate a kusiut prerogative, but nothing comparable to that required for a potlatch; in fact, poor men are often persons of great importance within the ranks of the society. Nor are the prerogatives considered to be as valuable as ancestral rights, so that slaves are often admitted as kukusiut by their masters. An important kusiut is not esteemed by the community in the same way as the donor of many potlatches; in short, membership in the society brings limited ceremonial and semi-religious advantage, not social prestige of a public nature.

Any secret society can be viewed from the standpoints of a member, and of a non-member. The scope of the kusiut organization can be most clearly outlined by describing first what an uninitiated person knows about it. From his infancy, parents impress upon a child the supernatural powers of the kukusiut and the dangers attached to their rites. Such instruction is perhaps strongest where one, or both, is not a member. They then voice their own fears, and do not merely deceive for the good of the society. Steeped as every child is in a firm belief of the near presence of the supernatural, he readily believes what he is told. He learns, for example, that if, without special invitation, he dares enter the house where a kusiut dance is taking place—at any time during the four days or more that it lasts—his spirit will be drawn from him. This is sufficient to deter him from prying too closely into the rites. Strangely enough, there seem always to have been differences in teaching with respect to this deception. It is believed that if a non-

*575 648 688 721 [628] only by members of the same tribe. The Bella Coola firmly believe that if, for example, there is a serious disaster at Qomqo·ts, that village will be raided by the people of Bella Bella, Fort Rupert, Kitkatla, or by tribes even farther away. News of the accident reaches Tāl·io or Kimsquit and the inhabitants, themselves related by blood to the offenders and therefore unwilling to punish them, call upon the members of a foreign tribe to do so. On different occasions this statement, in practically identical terms, was made by six independent informants, so there appears to be not the slightest doubt as to the belief of the people in this law. But when specific cases were asked for, they could not be obtained. It therefore appears clear that the Bella Coola, probably owing to long teaching on the part of the kukusiut, consider that an error in ritual is sufficient to bring punishment from an alien tribe. There must be some basis of truth in this conviction, and it is highly probable that the kukusiut must have taken advantage of raids to explain to the uninitiated that these were caused by disasters in ritual. One informant was of the opinion that, following the collapse of a house at Kimsquit during a Cannibal dance, a Bella Coola chief called upon Tsāsia, chief of the Kitkatla, who raided Kimsquit in punishment. Quite apart from the belief inculcated in the uninitiated, it is obvious that tribes eager for war sometimes used an accident as pretext. The Bella Coola know of no case in which they raided a foreign tribe for this reason, although they state that if they had been called upon to act as punisher, they could not have refused.

*575 424 425 553 Leaving now the functions of the society as a whole, the rights of an individual member can next be described. Each kusiut has:

(1) A Kusiut Name. Like every other prerogative, a name of this type can be acquired from father, uncle, grandfather, or other relative, or even by a son from his mother. As a rule a kusiut wills his designation or designations, for a man may [556] have several, before death and his wishes are observed. Although the cost of validating such a prerogative is less than a potlatch, yet a Cannibal dance, for example, entails considerable expenditure, so a man entitled to give such a ceremony frequently lends his right to another, or it may lie dormant for generations. Like other loaned prerogatives, failure to return is a frequent cause of feud. A man frequently gives away a kusiut name-prerogative, and if he should give away all of them, he becomes legally an uninitiated. In such a case it is customary for his wife, or some relative, to give him a new kusiut prerogative, as is likewise the case when a master causes a slave to be initiated. A name is sometimes given to a person who resembles a deceased relative of the donor.

(2) A Patron, omätuts. Little need be said on this point. The words of the songs used by the dancer often describe his patron, always couched in mystical terms for the benefit of the uninitiated. If the supernatural associate performs any type of dance at the gathering above, so can his protégé perform on this earth, otherwise his power is limited to singing of the being. If an individual inherits prerogatives with the same patron from two different relatives, he can merge these to give a composite dance, with consequent additional power. Greedy individuals sometimes illegally add features to which they are not entitled, a cause of bitter feelings. Or one individual may own several prerogatives with different patrons. Although most kukusiut have only one, yet two or three are not uncommon and one case is known of a man with six distinct patrons. The uninitiated believe that from any one of these may come the call giving him the power to perform.

575* 424 776 [533] [535] [578]

(3) A Repository. In this subterranean shelter his name remains, guarded by Awa'likwalsaix. An individual with several prerogatives has a repository for each.

575* 424 778

Although the kukusiut are aware that much of their ritual is deception, it is clear that they believe in the supernatural origin of their rites, and that their ancestors actually had the abilities which their descendants of today imitate. In time

years in deceiving, undoubtedly begins to convince himself that he is different from lesser mortals. 575* 778

Before describing in detail initiation into the kusiut society, and then the ritual of various dances, it will be convenient to outline the type of ceremonial, although emphasizing the fact that each differs so much from every other that lengthy descriptions will be necessary later on. When a person has been initiated, either in the proper manner during the ceremonial season or as a "shaman" during the summer, he is known as a lax, a novice, until the kusiut dances of the next winter. During this period he wears certain distinctive cedar-bark ornaments and is expected to keep himself somewhat apart from the uninitiated. He is always required to give his ceremonial during the first dance season after initiation; by so doing he ceases to be a novice. In later years a kusiut can suit himself whether or not to perform. Having once done so, he is a fully qualified member of the society, nor does he increase his rank in direct proportion to the number of his ceremonies. It is true that one who often dances hears himself praised by the marshals, and gains a certain amount of fame among his fellow kukusiut. But no matter how often he may perform, he cannot become a chief, with prestige spread far and wide among neighbouring tribes, nor can he increase the fame of his ancestors by adding lustre to his ancestral names. Thus the benefits are not sufficient to urge a man to concentrate on kusiut ceremonials in preference to potlatches. The society is essentially one in which a relatively poor man can display his semi-religious prerogative equally with a chief. Usually, a man performs a complicated ritual, such as that of a Cannibal dance, three or four times during his lifetime; less onerous ones in which no dramatic theme is presented may be more often given.

A man who proposes to give a dance must always notify one of the marshals of his village, who summons his fellows, some of the senior members of the society, and chiefs who are also kukusiut to discuss the intention. If it entails one of the perform several ancient rites through a desire to "show off" before someone who was ignorant. In recent years there has been a tendency to concentrate on kusiut ceremonials, and to judge a man's worth by his lavishness in them, but this is only a modern development due to the prohibition of the potlatch. Nevertheless, even in former times some individuals preferred to invite foreign guests to kusiut dances and to give them valuable gifts rather than to save these for potlatches; such a ceremony is called a kukusiutek. Whenever strangers are present at a kusiut dance they receive small pieces of dyed cedar-bark as proof of the friendly intentions of the host. The general consensus of Bella Coola opinion is that it is foolish for a man to concentrate on kusiut performances, particularly if he impoverish himself to the detriment of potlatches.

Although foreign guests are seldom invited to kusiut rites, a dancer frequently calls in his fellows from adjacent villages. But as the ceremonial season is simultaneous in the different settlements, with almost nightly performances, it is often impossible to avoid conflict in dates. Which invitation shall have preference is decided in the following manner:

During the days of qothm and nekusam the dancer sends a herald of powerful physique to invite guests from as many villages as he wishes. Simultaneously, a messenger may be approaching from the opposite direction with a similar invitation. Each envoy watches carefully around each bend in the path for his rival, and whichever can first call out his message is entitled to continue to give his invitation in the village of the outwitted herald. It is considered exceedingly bad taste to decline a summons, so the ceremony to which the defeated herald was bearing an invitation must be postponed. Sometimes the two messengers sight one another simultaneously, and the relative priority of their messages is then decided by a contest of strength. The rivals stand in the path, shoulder to shoulder, arms close to their sides, and shove with all their strength, the winner being the one who can force his opponent to move his feet. This last means of deciding is used exclu-

[Kusiut Society Initiation]

X sometimes receives two prerogatives at his initiation, one from each parent, 575* or from some other interested relative. In this case both are 796 expounded. The singers listen intently, knowing that they [425] will later be called upon to compose songs on the theme, or [553] themes. According to some informants they immediately sing [533] one, as if they had just created it, though it was really prepared in advance. The kukusiut listen until they have mastered it.

Helpers now distribute the food provided by X's father, 575* or whoever is responsible for his initiation. At every kusiut 796 ceremonial the marshals are the first recipients, then the 556 singers, and finally the others without distinction. As the [264] guests are eating, X's father gives presents to all, without deference to rank. An announcer calls out:

"Here are [for example] ten bear-skins from X's mother. They are to obtain for him his cedar-bark bracelets."

These goods are then distributed. Similarly other gifts from various relatives are handed out for his anklets, his blanket, his collar, his head-dress, and all other parts of his clothing. As each item of his ceremonial costume is validated, [425]
X dons the prepared article. A novice's head-dress consists of a round roll of dyed cedar-bark, covering a grass frame; in [292]
Staux and the other villages of the upper valley this is decor- [784] ated with a tuft of swan's down. The kukusiut of these villages also wear a distinctive decoration consisting of a swan's skin [237] with the feathers attached. In recent years it has been customary to pile all the goods together and distribute them as ály-ll, which has the significance of "something that has vanished for the novice's dyed cedar-bark." Theoretically, the aim of the donor is to bestow his presents on all equally, but if he finds that he has some remaining, he gives these to the chiefs, or to the relatives of someone whom he expects will soon be a novice. None of the goods used in general distributions are returnable, but a chief who receives an extra gift at the end usually remembers from whom it was received and cancels his indebtedness at the earliest opportunity. There is no close connection between the disbursements and the worth of the

*575 individual, other than an indefinite recollection of the amount 796 of goods used for his dyed cedar-bark. People always have 556 sufficient goods to validate kusiut prerogatives; in fact, if a proud person gives too lavishly to confirm the initiation of a relative, the marshals sometimes burn the goods, giving no explanation other than that the uninitiated must not be led to believe that a kusiut ceremony is an affair of wealth like a potlatch. Formerly, goods were given only at initiation ceremonies, but between 1880 and 1890 a chief gave presents, instead of food, at a dance. His example was followed, since none was willing to be outdone, although such gifts are still called "food." The name of the donor is always announced, whether he is the dancer himself or one of his relatives.

*575 X, though now a member of the kusiut society, is still a 984 novice and cannot give a dance[11] until the next ceremonial
[796] season, that is, until one year has elapsed. The marshals instruct him about his costume, and about the manner in which he must deport himself during this period, matters which depend to a considerable extent upon his prerogative. If he [262] is a Cannibal, Scratch, or Breaker dancer he must not eat unsmoked salmon, nor must he enter a house in which either a potlatch or a memorial potlatch is taking place.[12] Failure to obey this injunction would warrant punishment from a foreign [302] tribe. Unless his prerogative is to give one of these, or the Ghost dance, he must keep his face constantly blackened.
[292] Every novice must wear a collar of dyed cedar-bark. The marshals warn him to be circumspect in dealing with uninitiated persons; he can talk to them, but it is most improper for him to engage in any familiarity or frivolous play. Above [524] all, he must neither gamble nor take part in non-athletic games,

[11] A Cannibal novice, however, begins to exercise his prerogative immediately, although he must also perform a complete dance the following year.

[12] This prohibition was once broken at Kemp-ts. A skilled leader was required to arrange the tests at a memorial potlatch and the only man fit for the purpose, a resident of Sand, was a Cannibal novice. After much deliberation he was called upon, but great care was taken to hide his identity and it was years before the infraction became known.

THE DANCE OF Wł·a

*575 *996 556 Although potlatches and kusiut dances cannot take place simultaneously in the same house, and although the former are supposedly completed before the beginning of the ceremonial season, they often overlap the lengthy preliminaries of the Noäkynim dance. In such cases, when visiting the houses of the village, the kukusiut are careful to pass by the one in which the potlatch is going on. It often happens that foreign guests are still present when Noäkynim ascends the river and their host wishes to provide entertainment for them in the shape of a spectacular kusiut display. This is possible if a kusiut with a wł·a prerogative is willing to have a call come to him. It [424] is probable that in every village there is at least one kusiut with this prerogative; in Tcimotl the owner is a certain Łukwala,[30] in Kimsquit a woman named Nunuxemlaix. An ancestor of the former received his designation at the direct wish of Älquntäm as leader of the supernatural kukusiut. It is unnecessary to describe the ritual in detail in both places, although certain differences must be mentioned. It will be convenient to refer to the dancer as X. He has ten patrons, the nine brothers [776] Xemxemälotla, Xemcua, Omqamkilka, Äimälotla, Äiamkilka, Qomcua, Qwlaxwoa, Kwlilias Nuskämptä, Älmäk[*], and their sister Ťlitcäplilän·a.[31] These supernatural beings remain in Nusmät·a except when summoned below by X, or when Ťlitcäplilän·a appears for her own purposes as already described.

If X accedes to the request of the donor of the potlatch and is willing to summon his patrons from above, one or other of them interviews the marshals, and if these acquiesce, the rite can proceed. In Bella Coola X asks the help of four kukusiut *575 who are termed his "Path Clearers"; no special prerogative is *996 required to perform this service. For four days X lies on the floor of his house, near the door to the back-room, while his lieve the thud on the roof, which is made by an accomplice, is the call itself, or a being bringing it to X, is problematical. All non-members are expelled immediately, including guests other than Kimsquit or Täl·io kukusiut. One is tempted to conjecture whether or not the donor of the potlatch does not use this rite as a means of getting rid of his guests if they show a disposition to linger too long. 575* 796* [787] [556]

The call having come to X, this is the day of Isuxtämem. In the early evening a herald goes up and down the platform outside the houses, calling out in effect:

"He has been pressed to earth beneath the weight."

No mention is made of who "he" may be, although the uninitiated are well aware. The herald then enters each house in order, starting at the bottom, to invite the kukusiut to assemble in X's. After he has been aided by the beating of sticks, four times repeated, the singers seat themselves behind the fire, where X joins them. The fiction is always carried out that the call has brought him a song, which he pretends to sing or recite to the singers who appear to be listening intently. Usually he says nothing, or talks about something else, though sometimes the deception is furthered by X first learning the words from the musicians and repeating them as if teaching. 575* 796* 533 [787]

The theme is always of the supernatural patrons and how the offering attracts them. Since only kukusiut are present and since they all understand the methods, this part of the ceremony may be slighted.[49] The singers beat out and sing the song a number of times, softly, as if practising, then more loudly for the benefit of the audience, and finally at full strength while X dances. Later in the season when many kukusiut have performed, and there is danger of the songs being forgotten, it is customary to sing them over on the night of Isuxtämem while the owner of each song dances. Throughout, the whistle sounds, to the awe of the uninitiated in the other 575* 796*

*575 *796 *I···, and ao···,[41] revolving sunwise at the same time. Ano°likwolsaix does not fail to point out to the uninitiated: "That is the way he sings up above. Look at him! That is what he does in his own home."

*575 *796 If foreigners, guests for the potlatch, are in attendance, Ano°likwolsaix adds that the supernatural beings are disappointed at having been called too late for it. Then the uninitiated 556 are expelled, the masks burnt, and the kukusiut disperse.

A few further notes are necessary on this dance. If a potlatch is to be given after the kusiut season, the calling of these supernatural beings is sometimes reserved as the last kusiut dance, and any foreigners present, as uninitiated guests, are told that the beings have come for the ceremony. There is [776] thus a superficial appearance of confusion between these kusiut patrons and susaok deities. It is nothing more than a resemblance, since the nine brothers do not appear at the potlatch, and nothing is said to explain their absence; it is merely a subterfuge to increase the interest of the rite. Nor is any [787] connection necessary; in fact, X usually obtains his call like any other kusiut, without the spectacular throwing of presents on the fire. In this case X and the marshals consult and select the proper day for the beginning of the ceremony. On the *575 night preceding that chosen, the kukusiut are called to X's *796 house and one of the marshals announces that he can hear X's 787 call wanting to come to him. He answers simply:

"I am afraid."

The uninitiated are not expelled from X's house, so that they learn what is to take place. No ritual occurs on that evening, but one of X's friends remains constantly with him, as if to assist in any emergency. Kukusiut are often sent up the slopes of the neighbouring mountains with whistles which the uninitiated hear, and which lead them to believe that supernatural beings are in the vicinity.

[The Cannibal Dance]

through the village announcing what has taken place. Meanwhile X, maddened by the taste of blood, dashes from the house, closely guarded by a number of kukusiut. Growling, he enters the lowest house of the village and, to the uninitiated there, it appears as if the restraint of his guardians is all that prevents the biting demon from breaking loose among them. This is repeated at every house in the village, and then X returns to that in which qotlum is taking place, where he is guided to his usual corner and a kusiut throws cold water over him. Any senior kusiut, often one who is also a shaman, calls on those present to beat time, and the frenzied orchestra of sticks sounds forth. X remains quiet and more water is thrown over him. This pounding of sticks is four times repeated, and after each more water is thrown over the Cannibal, until at last his temporary fit of frenzy is stilled. Then the kukusiut eat in comfort and leave. It must be remembered that the uninitiated hear the beating of sticks from adjacent houses, and their awe is perhaps increased by the fact that they cannot actually see what is taking place. 575* 796* [781]

This liability to madness lasts throughout the ceremonial season, effectively suppressing any venturesome uninitiated, and at the same time serving as a bond of union among the kukusiut themselves, who must sink individual differences of opinion in face of the absolute necessity of upholding X's prestige. A Cannibal novice can likewise become frenzied at any time during the summer following his initiation. [626]

The Cannibal dance entails a considerable amount of physical and mental effort, while if X bites many individuals, as he likes to do as a means of demonstrating his prerogative, he is forced to expend a considerable amount of goods as "Bandages." These two factors often deter a man from performing this dance. A Cannibal who has just been initiated as a kusiut at once begins to bite, and is carried away to the upper regions. He is required, moreover, to give his ceremony the following winter, like any other novice. During the summer he generally remains hidden within his house, and when he goes 575* 796* 556 [431] [424]

[The Cannibal Dance]

*575 to the woods he is always accompanied by a number of kukusiut *796 to drive the uninitiated from his path. If it were necessary to perform the full rite just described, it would, in effect, limit 556 this dance to wealthy individuals. One reason why it is possible for a poor Bella Coola to become a Cannibal is that on his second, or subsequent, ceremonial, he can give an abbreviated rite, known as lilstom. The essence of this is *575 that a kindly supernatural being has visited X on earth, saving
*796 him from the perils of going aloft. In this case the ritual 787 closely follows that of a normal kusiut dance and is concluded in four days.

After the nebusam rites of some other kusiut have been concluded, the call comes to X, who responds by growling and biting a few people. The uninitiated are at once expelled from his house. Thanks to the friendly intervention of the supernatural being, usually Ālquntäm, X's mental powers are unimpaired so that he does not become infuriated and bites only a few individuals. As with ordinary kusiut rites, the singers [533] beat out a song composed for the occasion, describing the beneficent being who came down to X, and the kukusiut practise and learn it. No other songs are rehearsed on this night, owing to the extreme solemnity of the occasion; it is a Cannibal rite and nothing can take place at the same time.

The next day is nusiutälsap; a second song is composed and a number of the kukusiut are sent to collect wood for [532] masks. Six of these must be constructed representing the fol-[776] lowing supernatural beings:

Ālquntäm, who has benignly interfered to save X from risking the dangers of a trip aloft.

Ālqotleos, a supernatural man-eater from whom the call has come impelling X to eat flesh.

Three Ällipaios, "Holders," who restrain Ālqotleos. In the land above their function corresponds to that of the kukusiut who guard a Cannibal.

In the evening, after the work has been allotted, X's two to discuss the event and lay plans for the future, but as it is now daylight they too soon retire to sleep. 575* 796*

The kusiotem ceremony resembles a double kusiut rite since it comprises two sets of four days and nights. The one on which X's stomach was cut is considered to be lsuxtämem. Accordingly, the heralds call the kukusiut to X's house early on the afternoon following and the regular ritual of nusiutälsap takes place. Some of the younger men are at once sent to the forest for wood to be made into more masks but, with the love of drama typical of the kukusiut, it is assumed that X himself is too feeble to accompany them. Accordingly his power is transferred to a substitute by means of the frenzied beating of sticks and repeated cries of hoip. On the return of the wood collectors, who carry their burdens as usual on tump-lines and set them down carefully, this power is restored to X in the same manner. The work of making the masks is now allotted. For kusiotem, and several other kusiut rites hereafter to be described, the dancer is entitled to show as many of the beings in the Bella Coola pantheon as he desires. Consequently if X is wealthy and wishes to have a spectacular nebusam, he orders many masks. Then the kukusiut practise a number of songs composed by the singers. One, or sometimes two, prepared for X is couched as if he himself were telling what he had seen in the upper regions. They describe Ăłquntäm, his messenger Oǫolikts Ăłquntäm, and, especially Kułsłkäkmidjut, the supernatural being whose stomach is periodically cut in the land above. It is he who has entered X and impelled him to suffer the same mutilation from the effects of which Snitsmän·a has restored him. X himself usually remains concealed behind the matting in the rear part of the house, but sometimes, if he wishes to practise what he will perform the next night, he comes forward for a rehearsal. He still pretends to be very ill, and instead of dancing in the usual violent manner, totters around the fire, supported by several assistants, while he feebly shakes his hands. The women drone, and the uninitiated in the other houses realize that more exciting events are impending.

time of day, X must sing. The heralds call everyone to his house where the singers at once compose a new song, describing sun or moon as the case may be. They then sing it while X dances. Other kukusiut have the prerogative of dancing at an eclipse of the sun, and still others at an eclipse of the moon, but X claims to be the only one entitled to dance at both. 575* 796* 821 [533] [424]

THE MYSTERY DANCE

Mystery is the key-note of all kusiut dances, but in the one termed Ałmutsämk that element is brought home so forcibly to the uninitiated that it may aptly be called the Dance of Mystery. The Bella Coola explain that the word Ałmutsämk means staḑam, "What Is Hidden." The essence of the rite, as explained to non-members, is that the supernatural power which has come to the dancer is embodied in three supernatural beings or in manifestations of them. Unless someone guesses its locations, the performer will die. The Mystery dance is one of the most lengthy Bella Coola rituals and necessitates such a lavish expenditure of food that only a rich man can undertake it. 575* 796* [556]

Accounts were obtained of the ritual as carried out by Qoxołän·i of Tcumotł and Saixnäs of Kimsquit, both of whom have the necessary prerogative. The details differ so slightly in the two localities that only one description need be given, and the dancer can be spoken of as X. The patron of most Mystery dancers is Sänołłxumułełts Ałquntäm, but that of Saixnäs is Kokostxum, a supernatural being remarkable for his wild and erratic behaviour. [424] [776]

When X has stored up as much food as he thinks necessary, he calls the marshals together to tell them of his desire to dance. In case of consent, they admonish him not to hurry matters but to perform the rite slowly and properly. Preliminary arrangements include the choosing of four kukusiut gifted with good memories to store up in their minds the guesses made by the uninitiated. If many kukusiut are anxious to dance, X usually asks permission on the night of a

[The Mystery Dance]

*575 *796 kukusiut who listen as usual to words of advice from the marshals.

X retires once more to his enclosure and throughout the night the sound of his rattling apron can be heard. Here he remains for four more days, except when making his round of the village twice daily, or when attending the ceremony of another kusiut. When a qothm comes, X does not immediately put in an appearance, but waits until all other kukusiut have taken their places. Someone asks where X is, and a herald is sent specially for him. He enters, and proceeds at once to the left corner behind the fire where he stands throughout all the dances, moving his feet as if marking time to the music, but not altering his position. When all have danced, both kukusiut and uninitiated are invited to guess X's secret, and answers pour in rapidly. X heightens the interest by pretending that someone has almost solved it before Ánuyulikailaix "pulled back his thoughts," as the Bella Coola express it. He finally passes sunwise around the fire and returns home.

On the evening of the fourth day after the kukusiut were invited to X's house, they are summoned there once more. First they learn a new song, composed for the occasion, then, as before, the uninitiated are called in and everyone tries to guess the three hiding places. This is followed by the same elaborate feast. Henceforth the kukusiut are called to X's house on every fourth evening, and a new song is composed and food distributed on every occasion. X makes two rounds of the village daily, and attends the qothm of every kusiut. This succession of dances may continue for a month or six weeks; [556] in fact, the deciding factor is usually X's desire to distribute no more food. In former times it is probable that the necessity for an emaciation-producing diet was an important consideration in choosing when to conclude the dance.

The time finally comes when X or his family wants the riddle answered. The marshals discuss the matter on the evening preceding one of the regular gatherings of the kukusiut in X's house. Two important points must be settled. First,

[The Mystery Dance]

*575 masks representing the three successful answers. Little atten-
*796 tion is paid to actual design, and the workmen use their ini-
532 tiative to a considerable extent.[22] One mask always made is that of Snuslaxwai, a being who appears to act as concealer for Ałquntäm. As far as could be learnt, if Ałquntäm wishes to conceal anything from a human being, such as the hiding-places in a Mystery dance, Snuslaxwai is entrusted with the task. In addition to the usual well-known supernatural beings, X often orders representations of mammals, birds, or fish; he may even ask a man to make a mask without stipulations and then the finished product is as much a surprise to him as to anyone else. There is no relationship between the masks made [556] and the guesses registered. If X is wealthy, the number to be constructed may run to fifty or more. Nusiutälsap concludes in the usual way as soon as all the work has been allotted.

Two days is not long enough for the completion of such a large number of masks, so nebusam must be postponed, and qotłm is correspondingly delayed for four days. In the evening the heralds invite first the kukusiut and then the eager, though [184] fearful uninitiated. They take their places and in Kimsquit, not in Bella Coola, marvel at some of the masks hanging behind the fire, though no explanation is vouchsafed them until the following evening. Presently the singers begin to beat out one of
*575 X's songs and he starts dancing violently, only to stop long *796 before it is ended. The musicians quickly change to another; he performs briefly, then ceases; this is repeated for a third tune, and similarly for a fourth, a fifth, and so on. If the preliminaries have been long drawn out, X may have as many as twenty songs and he dances to a fragment of each. After he has performed, the singers strike up the tune of any kusiut

[178] [22]Possibly this disregard for exact portrayal of supernatural beings is a modern degeneration. The Bella Coola of today say quite frankly that they have forgotten many beings used by their ancestors, so have no hesitation in inventing new designs and naming them even for natural phenomena which they consider must be caused by supernatural agency. On the other hand, the burning of masks, which seems to be an old practice, would tend to lessen conventionalization in all but the best-known figures.

[The Dance of the Otter]

*575 below a rapids. Care is taken that the uninitiated do not ob-
*796 serve these arrangements. About noon on nebusam the heralds go to every house with a cry:

"Come to watch the kusiut catch the supernatural one in the river."

The uninitiated are wise enough to remain within their houses as the kukusiut troop down to the bank of the river. Presently X appears, clad in the usual ceremonial costume. In he dives, as if in pursuit of the dark shape which can be seen swirling to and fro in the water. Non-members, watching from the background, are amazed to see what appears to be a struggle, followed by the emergence of X clutching an otter in his arms. They are too far away to perceive that it is merely a dummy, nor do they know that a kusiut has assisted the performer by cutting the rope at the proper time. As X reaches shore with his burden the kukusiut women drone. Forcing his way through the throng of his associates, the performer goes to his house where the uninitiated presently hear the frenzied beating of sticks repeated four times. The dummy is carefully concealed in the back-room so that it can be used if necessary on a later occasion.

As X comes ashore, water is splashed in all directions from [556] the dummy and often dampens several of the kukusiut. Anyone to whom this happens is expected to give his clothes to a herald, and a man of chief-like disposition never hesitates to do so; in fact, he welcomes this opportunity of displaying his generous nature.

It is probable that a number of masked figures appear on the evening of nebusam, but detailed information is lacking. It might be added that a question as to whether the catching of this otter had any influence on the ability of X as an otter hunter was regarded by the informant as highly humorous.

*575 Cannibal begins to growl and soon the kukusiut are left alone
*796 in the house. The singers beat out a new song for X and the ritual continues like that of any other lsuxtämem. No description is needed for the ceremonial that occurs on nusiutälsap and qotlim.

On the evening of nebusam the uninitiated are summoned in due course. The exact number of masked figures shown [532] could not be learnt, but among them is always an octopus. The rite concludes in the usual manner.

The presents given in connection with the Octopus dance [431] are more valuable than those bestowed at most kusiut rituals, accordingly none but wealthy people are able to carry it out.
[556] The heralds especially are always beneficiaries.

THE DANCE OF THE DARK-SHADE

*575 One of the most peculiar and irregular of kusiut dances is *796 that performed by a certain Kälqam, whom it will be conven-424 ient to call X. His patron is the supernatural woman Stcqwast-
[776] lustkwi, Dark-Shade, whose home is beneath the thick evergreens of the river valleys, thus explaining the darkness and shadows found in such places. X's repository is beneath some [778] large cedars near the northern side of the Bella Coola valley, a few hundred yards above the end of the fiord; it is probable that other dancers with the same patron have repositories in other dark and gloomy spots.

When X wishes to dance he must as usual obtain consent from the marshals who insist that he delay his performance until after the solstice at earliest. The reason is because his [776] patron, Dark-Shade, alone of all supernatural beings, has the power to open every repository; X brings her to the village and [787] in consequence calls come to many kukusiut,[100] which would be undesirable during the first few weeks of the season. On *575 the evening of the day selected for the beginning of the dance,
*796 X steals away from the village with three or four kukusiut, [100] The implication in this case is that calls come from repositories, not from the land above, the customary source.

(a) Recorded as song VII D 46a, National Museum of Canada; singer, Jim Pollard. This song is said to have been used about 1870.
(b) This is a reference to Sang[w].
(c) This is a grandiloquent expression, such as are common in kusiut songs.
(d) Referring to Nuätkymm, the dancer's patron.
[805] (e) That is: The calendrical experts have come to an agreement.
(f) That is: They have abbreviated the period of waiting owing to their greed. This song was used by the kulusiut at one of their gatherings during Nuätkymm's approach. At Kimsquit no uninitiated were present on such occasions so it was possible to indulge in comments without betraying the secrets of the society. The significance here is that the experts were so greedy to share in the food that they agreed to say that Nuätkymm had arrived before his proper time.
(g) That is: Water constantly re-fills. By water is meant food and mountain goat grease.
[556] (h) That is: The dishes of which the contents, when distributed, increase his status.

(a) "The Beautifier." This is one of the appellations of the infant's patron, the otter, so-called because people adorn themselves whenever an Otter dance is given. 533*
(b) Recorded as song VII D 16a, National Museum of Canada; singer, Jim Pollard. This song was composed for, and used during the hoxlat season of 1923-4 at the initiation of Lilitsawdzis, a female infant distantly related to Xemtsalwala. [776]
(c) A reference to Otter, the neophyte's patron. The significance is that chiefs have an opportunity to display, "open," their generosity by lavish giving at every Otter dance. [556]
(d) The elaborate ritual of an Otter dance dispels grief. It was impossible to obtain individual translations for these two subdivisions.
(e) Referring to one of the dead man's ancestors. The theme changes, and is henceforth of the usual mourning pattern.
(f) Referring to the dead Xemtsalwala.
(g) "The Loftiest." This is one of the many designations for Nusqalst, one of the dead man's crests.
(h) A reference to the expanding house described in the dead man's origin myth. [773]
(i) One of Xemtsalwala's names.
(j) This is another name for Nusqalst. The meaning of the whole part is: Xemtsalwala sits down within the expansible house on Mount Nusqalst. There is the added implication that he seats himself as does his supernatural namesake in the land above.

Non-Ceremonial Songs

The Bella Coola are not an intensely musical people. Singing in unison is an essential feature of every ceremonial rite, but, when alone, an individual seldom bursts into melody from sheer joie de vivre. They have, however, a certain number of non-ceremonial songs, shorter and more diverse in theme than any of those previously recorded. The people themselves do not attempt to classify them, though they can conveniently be grouped in accordance with their themes. Some deal with love; others are sung jocularly at sight of certain birds or mammals, while a third class can only be described as miscellaneous. Still others accompany stories and games; these are included in vol. II, chap. V, and appendix B. [796]* [825]

CHAPTER III

WARFARE[1]

General Observations — Specific Accounts

General Observations

721 PRIOR to the establishment of British rule, there was con-
648 siderable warfare among the coastal tribes of British Columbia. Long-continued struggles leading to the extermination of one or other of the participants were unknown, but there were constant raids, counter-raids, forays, and attacks. These were never as continuous as on the Plains, where martial achievements were regarded more highly than on the coast, but it appears probable that at least several villages of the Bella Coola were embroiled every few years. Nevertheless,
[796] war was secondary in importance to ceremonial rites. During the winter, peace reigned and members of hostile tribes were even received as guests at some dances. At potlatches they [556] might be subjected to insult, later to be avenged in the same manner or by active hostility, but seldom was actual violence offered either to envoys or guests. The symbol of peace and 726 friendliness was eagle down; the occupants of a canoe who 825 bore an invitation to a potlatch, or who were guests them-
778 selves, used to blow this substance up into the air whenever another craft approached, and it was incumbent on the latter [486] to veer over to the other side of the channel. Eagle down was [578] considered to be so sacred that when two men were quarrelling
[627] a chief could stop them by blowing some of it over their heads.
721 In winter, hostilities were prevented by ceremonies, and in summer the people were usually busy laying in supplies of food; consequently, it was only in the late spring that fighting was [575] at all common. Even then the dictates of ceremonial life were [622] not entirely forgotten; no kuxiut novice went to war and

seldom a chief who had given many potlatches. Successful raiders rarely slew such an one; his position placed him above the dangers to which lesser men were subject. [721] [575] [622]

Raids appear never to have been carried out solely for the purpose of giving warriors opportunities to display their prowess, or of permitting young men to prove their mettle. Scarcity of food was the commonest cause for forays when, of course, the victims were chosen for their accumulated supplies. The Kwakiutl especially, lacking abundance of salmon, often attacked the Bella Coola. Even more dreaded were the Kitkatla, the most warlike people of the central coast, who used to raid for many miles to carry off slaves whom they sold or traded for other commodities. Trespassing, too, was a source of friction which often led to hostility. In such a case, the offenders were usually held up to ridicule at potlatches, and the irritation gradually increased until wiped out in bloodshed. Members of a tribe which had suffered from a raid prompted by any of these motives would await a suitable opportunity for retaliation; this in turn would be avenged, and a vendetta often ensued lasting for generations. As already described, a ceremonial error brought punishment from a neighbouring tribe; this was the only motive which caused fighting between different Bella Coola villages. In the last century there was a struggle of this kind between the people of Stuw and Alqālāxl in which the former were victorious and took many slaves who were later ransomed. When ill-luck had dogged a village or a group of villages for some time, the inhabitants sometimes endeavoured to wipe out their misfortunes by attacking another tribe. [648] [685] [626] [556] [688] [628] [727] [777]

The teeming salmon at Bella Coola, Kimsquit, and Tāl·io, made it unnecessary for the Bella Coola to wage aggressive war for which they were unfitted both on account of their unmilitary attitude and their lack of central authority. On the other hand, they were tempting victims for more belligerent neighbours. The narrow Bella Coola valley, however, far removed from the open sea, and densely populated, was difficult to attack. killed, his reputation would only be increased by the manner of his death. At length Ne-wunkai fired into the air; not until a shower of eagle down was blown forth did anyone realize that his musket had been loaded with nothing more deadly. This marked the establishment of friendly relations.

The Kitkatla had brought their own singers, who now began to beat out time for Tsihsa to perform a sisaek dance. He was followed by several other chiefs, and then the strangers gave presents to influential Bella Coola on the most lavish scale. Patlu likewise performed a sisaek dance, and bestowed gifts on the guests to validate it; such were, of course, not returnable. A meal was then served, and after that Tsihsa made a speech of which the gist was that the Bella Coola had previously known his achievements as a warrior, they now knew his nobility and bravery in risking his life, and that the name Tsihsa could never be forgotten, irrespective of his own fate.

Tsihsa left soon afterwards. It was somewhat difficult fully to comprehend his motive in thus risking his life. Undoubtedly his main object was to display his valour and disregard of danger. Moreover, it gave him an opportunity to impress these qualities upon the Bella Coola, and thus to exhibit his prowess actually within the enemy's camp, which must have been a source of tremendous gratification to him. The alleged motive, regret at killing a chief, may have been a contributory factor.

Although this visit was an intimation from Tsihsa that the Bella Coola need have no further fear of him, the suspicions of years could not be immediately allayed; in fact, an occasional skirmish still took place although Tsihsa himself refrained from fighting. A few years after his visit to Bella Coola, Patlu prepared to give a potlatch to which he determined to invite the northern chief. Many of the Bella Coola doubted whether the Kitkatla warriors would respect the safe-conduct usually afforded to envoys, and no one was anxious to bear the invitation. At length six chiefs volunteered for the task and set out, though with many misgivings. They stopped en route at Bella Bella where a chief of that tribe, Ompa, joined the party; he thought that he would have influence with the Kitkatla and might add protection to the Bella Coola. Fearing to be seen by any small Kitkatla bands, the delegation travelled only by night until they could actually reach Tsihsa's village. As they paddled up, they indicated their mission by singing one of Patlu's sisaek songs. On hearing this, Tsihsa asked one of his Bella Coola slaves whose song it might be, and when he answered that it was one of Patlu's, Tsihsa despatched a chief, Kwinas, to invite the guests to his house. Ompa was thankful when he saw this man approaching, since he felt that it heralded a friendly welcome. The party was conducted to Tsihsa's dwelling in spite of the fact that a Cannibal dance was taking place there. All the messengers were hamsta in Bella Coola, while three had Bella Bella rights as well; Tsakoa allowed the latter to take part in the ceremony while the former were treated as uninitiated. They were greatly interested in the details of the Kitkatla rites, which were exceedingly strict and included the eating of a corpse. At the conclusion, the envoys received their share of the small presents which were distributed.

At this juncture one of the envoys, Xemoemlala, fell seriously ill and was cured only through the attention and care of one of Tsakoa's wives. This delayed their departure so that it was a long time before they and the invited guests finally set out, much to the envy of two Bella Coola slaves who greatly desired to return home.

Meanwhile the long absence of the messengers had filled the Bella Coola with fear that they had been massacred, and there was great rejoicing when a large flotilla was seen approaching. The guests landed on the shore at Sympo-ts where the customary ceremonious greetings were exchanged. Many of the Bella Coola, inflamed by ancient wrongs, endeavoured to break the canoes of the guests and in other ways to threaten them, but Pielas finally succeeded in restraining them and establishing some kind of discipline. The ceremony that took place that night in the house of Pielas is said to have been the most spectacular ever witnessed in Bella Coola. One old man who, as a mere lad, had attended, grew eloquent as he spoke of the lavish display. Unfortunately, he had had no part in the rites and could remember none of the details except that his childish mind was amazed at a dance in which a masked performer, representing a whale, vomited grease on the fire to give light. Tsakoa did not return home immediately, but remained in Bella Coola until spring when the weather was more suitable for travelling.

This exchange of hospitality virtually ended all hostility, although the Bella Coola and other tribes of the central coast still regard their northern neighbours with dislike and suspicion. Between 1880 and 1890 a party of Rivers Inlet people went to Kitlope to prepare olachen grease, for which purpose a number of Kitkatla had also camped there. Among them was Tsakoa, a descendant of the warrior chief whose exploits have been recounted, and his nephew. One day the latter was gambling with Matsu-a, a Rivers Inlet youth who had recently been initiated into the hamsta society and was consequently decorated with a cedar-bark collar. Matsu-a's luck was amazing and some of the Kitkatla's friends asked him why he continued to play with a man who was clearly in such close contact with the supernatural that he could not lose. Heedless of this advice, Tsakoa's nephew continued until finally, losing his temper, he

the first time that two girls were missing. Then they set forth on the track of the Carriers. The raiders, knowing that their assault could not have been heard in any village, and unaware of the three young people hidden in the woods, took no precautions. The first night the pursuers reached the camp where the Carriers had built a long, narrow fire of some kind of wood which emitted no sparks, on either side of which they had placed a long tree-trunk on which to rest their feet as they dried their moccasins at the flames. One of the Bella Coola girls was placed near one end of the fire, the other at the other end on the opposite side. Neither could sleep, but kept watching silently in the hope of being able to escape. Towards dawn one of them was overjoyed to see a Bella Coola scout peering around a tree-trunk. He motioned her to keep silent and she nodded to show that she understood his signal; then he went away. He told his waiting companions how the Carriers were resting with their feet over logs beside the fire, and suggested that they prepare heavy clubs. Having done this, the Bella Coola stole up behind the drowsing enemy. Each selected a victim and broke his leg, or legs, with a crack of the club. Not one of the raiders escaped, the cripples being killed without difficulty. In some manner this event was made the theme of a nusaḵ song.

The following unrelated incident is probably historically correct, in outline at least, since it is said to have taken place about 1860, and two of the participants were great-uncles of the man from whom the account was obtained.

One October a number of Carriers were staying at Nuxḵalst. Their chief was a certain Ṗimtlaxw who was distantly related to the people of that village, though he had long since ceased to be regarded as anything but a Carrier. The river was running full and though there were many cohoe and dog salmon in it, they were difficult to catch on account of the roaring torrent. A Nuxḵalst man, Ṗiwulist, had laid in an abundant store of fish for the winter, but his bad-tempered wife urged him to get her some fresh salmon and he ventured forth. A drifting log struck his canoe; he called out for help, but before it reached him, his craft capsized and he was drowned. Ṗiwulist was a popular man and there was great grief at his untimely death.

As was so often the case, jealousy was rife in Nuxḵalst, where a certain Nūxūt had become wealthy. He was a good carpenter, and his riches had been amassed as rewards for making ḵaxlat masks, but of course such payments had been made in secret and many people wondered how he had acquired his fortune. This was enough to cause a certain amount of suspicion, and a rival determined to take advantage of it. This man approached Ṗimtlaxw and said that he believed Nūxūt was responsible for Ẓelxwliotl's death, that he was sure the wealthy man was really a sorcerer, and had used some evil means to cause the fisherman's drowning. Ẓāmālxem was distantly related to the dead man and, thus incited, determined to kill Nānāt in revenge. That evening, as he was lying playing with his grandchild, the Carrier chief entered his house and thrust a musket against the unsuspecting man's chest. Nānāt quickly knocked down the muzzle so that the bullet, instead of killing him, merely passed through the fleshy part of his hipe. Ẓāmālxem made no attempt to run away. In such cases it rests with the relatives of the injured man whether or not to take revenge, and they usually avoid beginning a vendetta unless virtually driven to it. News of the assault spread down the valley, and two of Nānāt's nephews, Ṭsā·kmai and Oẓmikmẓ, went up to investigate. They were both men of considerable influence in the community, both validated warriors who had taken prominent parts in the unsuccessful attack on Kitkatla a few years before. Realizing that their uncle was not seriously wounded, the two brothers carried him to their canoe, intending to take him home and to disregard the assault.

During this time, the evil Nuẓẓalt man had been working on Ẓāmālxem's fears by telling him that Nānāt was certain to kill him by magical means, until he decided that he could escape only by murdering the wounded man. His followers learnt of this and tried to dissuade him, fearing the presence of the two famous warriors. As their canoe was going downstream, it was caught in an eddy and tipped so that one musket and both cartridge boards were lost. This seemed to Ẓāmālxem the chance for which he had been waiting: he fired from the bank and Nānāt fell dead, much to the consternation of his own followers as well as the Nuẓẓalt people.

If Ṭsā·kmai and Oẓmikmẓ had been ordinary men they would probably have fled downstream but, being duly validated men of valour, this course never occurred to them.[14] Oẓmikmẓ, who had one charge left in his musket, consulted his brother as to their course of action.

"Nānāt is dead," his brother replied. "It is probably time for us to die as well. You had better shoot."

Meanwhile Ẓāmālxem had remained on the bank, laughing at the two warriors. Oẓmikmẓ told him to be silent, then fired, instantly killing his uncle's murderer. The Carriers began to run to and fro on the shore, whence they could hear the two brothers talking to each other:

"Let us not think of escaping," said one. "We have displayed our characters today. If we are to die, let us die."

[14] The man from whom this account was obtained mentioned as a matter of course that condemned warriors could never run away; when questioned further, he explained that the public validation of bravery made it utterly impossible for them to flee from danger.

538 certain that his account is the only accurate one, and ridicules his rival, but as no social importance is attached to the tales, an error in narration is a matter of small moment. Probably there have been instances in which an individual possessing [556] much wealth has transformed a story into a family myth, but it was impossible to obtain a concrete illustration of this; it is thought that this may have been done in former years, though of course such would be absolutely contrary to custom.

Stories can be conveniently divided into two types:

[825] I. Those in which the principal character is a mammal or bird endowed with human intelligence.

II. Those in which the principal character is a human being.

[825] Many of the first type describe the adventures and mis-
[776] adventures of Raven. It must be remembered that the Bella Coola regard these stories as accurate statements of fact, and base their characterizations of many supernatural beings on their actions as recorded therein.

Raven Stories

HOW RAVEN BECAME BLACK

When Raven was being prepared for his descent to earth, Ālqnxōm told Mālālālitsēk to make him the prettiest of all the birds. When finished, he was adorned with many colours and was very handsome. But the vain Raven looked at himself and was not satisfied. First he asked that one arm might be changed, and when this was done as he desired, he asked for an alteration in one of his legs; and so on with nearly every part of his body. Finally, Ālqnxōm became angry, and told some of his assistants to throw ashes all over him. This made Raven a uniform black, in which guise he was sent down to earth.

RAVEN AND WATER OUZEL[3]

As he was able to assume any form, Raven, once upon a time, took that of a herald and went to the home of Water Ouzel, who, having spread a fine cedar-mat for his guest, proceeded to prepare a meal. He brought 105 of their omnipresence; the guiding force of public opinion is 182 seen as a check on individual licence, fostered or inculcated by the ties which hold together ancestral families and make it [626] impossible for a man to lead an isolated life where others will not be affected by his actions. If the white man is willing to receive new ideas, he will learn much from the comments of the Bella Coola on his own customs. Many have been to Victoria or Vancouver, and they feel that the contrasts of [556] wealth observable in such big cities are atrocious; they ask how this is compatible with Christianity. They feel that it is [602] unnatural for a man not to receive support from his cousins of [556] all degrees; that the hoarding of wealth for the mere gratification of personal desires is selfish; that the selling of land is extraordinary; and that failure to ascribe every incident to supernatural causes is sacrilegious. These differences of viewpoint on so many matters explain the first impression of strangeness. A careful investigator comes to realize that he is among a people who fundamentally differ but slightly from his compatriots, though outwardly they have little in common.

With respect to love, ambition, parental affection, sense of honour, pride, intelligence, even humour and vanity, the Bella Coola are essentially similar to ourselves. Unfortunately, these characteristics are expressed in ways unintelligible and often repellant to the casual traveller. If he will only look beneath the surface, he will find a people who are neither saints nor sinners, but essentially human, with the faults and follies as well as the elements of strength and wisdom which comprise, as Kipling puts it, "Men in a world of men."

177 The coming of the white civilization has been cataclysmic [161] to the Bella Coola. Within two generations they have been reduced to a mere handful; instead of living in scattered vil-[361] lages, roaming the mountains for game and fishing at will, they now dwell in a single settlement and the taking of animals and fish is subject to law; the introduction of metal tools and mechanical appliances has revolutionized their mode of life;
new foods, new clothing, new furniture has altered their living conditions; fermented drink has presented a factor unknown to their forefathers. Profound as these material changes have been, those of a psychological nature have been even more important. New worlds have been thrown open to them, stimulating ideas have been brought to their attention, and they have realized for the first time that the world is infinitely larger than they had imagined. Hand in hand with this extension of knowledge has gone disbelief in their own ancient lore. The white man, whose superiority and mechanical skill they admit, positively denies the actuality of their mythology, and laughs at the dramatic performances which were wont to fill the winter with engrossing interest. Such rites can flourish only in an attitude of profound belief: this has been so shaken that the dances continue listlessly, a mere shadow of a once living art. The young people were the first to embrace a scepticism that has rapidly grown into disbelief of the faith of their ancestors, and a half-concealed scorn for their elders, the upholders of the old customs. Worst of all, prohibition of the potlatch has made it impossible for a man to reach a position of social eminence. Moreover, since the holding of any type of ceremonial requires a distribution of gifts, formal gatherings of all kinds have become virtually impossible; even marriages have no longer the social support that formerly made them so lasting.

These cumulative blows would be enough to shake any civilization, and that of the Bella Coola has been entirely unable to adjust itself to the new conditions. The young people, having lost respect for their elders, are deprived of the advice and support essential to the continuity of culture. They ape the white man's dress; they want his mechanical devices, but have failed to assimilate them. For example, a gramophone in a Bella Coola house is an anachronism, while several similar articles spoil the old picture but do not provide a new one. Seeking to copy the new ways thrown open to them, they have achieved the outward show but not the substance, and in so doing have destroyed their own culture. In the old days they were ambitious to hold potlatches and willing to work steadily towards that goal; now, new desires have not kept pace with

614 The gens Spatsâ'tlt have breakers painted on the house-front, and use 532 in dances the mask of a large kind of whale (k·'xnts), of the crow, and of 342 the black bear.

The gens Tumqoâ'akyas use the mask of Ōnzstaitō'ma (=the sleeper) and the eagle.

The gens Tl'ak·aumō'ot of the Nusk·'x'lstemh use the moon (fig. 2).

The gens Ialo'stimōt of the Tâlio'mh use the raven, robin (sisi'a·qomâ), eagle, whale, the bird t'êntlala (genus?), and s'allel'ots, the flood-tide. They have sun, moon, and stars painted on the house-front, and the usqe·'mta suspended from the beams of the roof (see p. 420).

The highest gens of Nûtl'x'l has the name Smō'xn (=the north wind). He has the mountain Sûwâ'khh surmounted by a mackerel sky, and with clouds on its sides, painted on his house-front (fig. 3). Another object belonging to his crest represents waves.

614 The children belong to the gens of either father or mother, the deci-

Secret Societies and the Potlatch.

171 The social organisation, festivals, and secret societies of the Bilqula 575 are still more closely interrelated than they are among the Kwakiutl, and must be considered in connection. We have to describe here the potlatch, the Sisau'kh, and the Kû'siût. The Sisau'kh corresponds to the Tlôola'qa of the northern Kwakiutl tribes, the Kû'siût to the Ts'êtsâ'ek·a. The 556 Bilqula believe that the potlatch has been instituted by ten deities, nine 773 brothers and one sister, the foremost among whom is Qê'mtslea, to whose 776 care the sunrise is intrusted. He resides with the others in a beautiful house in the far east, and cries ô! ô! every morning when the sun rises. He has to take care that the sun rises properly. The first six of these deities are grouped in pairs, and are believed to paint their faces with designs representing moon, stars, and rainbow. In the Kû'siût these deities make their appearance, and are represented by masks which I have copied. Qē'mtaloa and Qēmqēmalâ'otla wear the design of the full moon, indicated in the mask Qē'mtaloa (fig. 4) by a double curved line in red and black, the black outside, passing over forehead, cheeks, and upper lip. Qēmqēmalâ'otla has a double curved line in red and black, the red outside, which passes over forehead, cheeks, and chin (fig. 5). Aiumkî'likya (fig. 6) and Aiumalâ'otla (fig. 7) wear the design of the crescent, drawn in red and black, with differences similar to those between the first and second. The fifth, K'ōmk'ōmkî'likya, and K'ō'mtaloa have designs representing stars (fig. 8), both wearing the same style of mask. The seventh is K'ula'qawa, whose face represents the blossom of a salmonberry bush (fig. 9). The next in order, Kulē'lias (=who wants to have blankets first), wears the design of the rainbow in black and blue (fig. 10). The ninth, At'amâ'k wears on the head a mask representing a kingfisher, and is clothed in a birdskin blanket. The last of the series is a woman called Tl'ōtsâ'aplētlâna (=the eater), the sister of all the others. Her face is painted with a bladder filled with grease (fig. 11). She figures in several legends as stealing provisions and pursued by the people whom she has robbed.

The Sisan'ku, which is danced at potlatches and other festivals of gentes, is presided over by a being that lives in the sun. A man who had gone out hunting met the Sisan'ku, and was instructed by him in the secrets of the dance. When he returned he asked the people to clean their houses, and to strew them with clean sand, before he consented to enter. Then he danced the Sisan'ku, and told the people what he had seen. He said that the being had commanded them to perform this dance and to adorn themselves when dancing with carved headdresses with represent. Every time the sacred objects of a gens are shown to the people a potlatch is given. The sacred objects, although the property of the various gentes, must nevertheless be acquired by each individual. That is to say, every free person has the right to acquire a certain group of carvings and names, according to the gens to which he or she belongs. Slaves and slaves' children, also illegitimate children, could not become Sisan'ĸн. A person cannot take a new carving, but must wait until it is given to him by his relatives—father, mother, or elder brother. Nusk'ɛ-lu'sta, to whom I owe my information regarding the gentes, and who is a member of the gens Ialo'stimöt of the Talio'mн, stated that he had received the raven when he gave his first potlatch. At his second potlatch he received the eagle. He hopes that his mother will give him the whale at his next potlatch, and will at the same time divulge to him the secrets connected with it. In course of time, he said, he might get even others from his brother; but if the latter's children should prove to be very good, and develop very rapidly, his brother would probably give his secrets to his children. At festivals, when a person acquires a new secret, he changes his name. Each person has two names, a Kū'sött name, which remains the same throughout life; and a Qē'mtelon name, which is changed at these festivals. Thus, Nusk'ɛlu'sta's (which is his Kū'sött name) present Qē'mtelon name is Atl'itlemɛ'lns'aiн, but at his next potlatch he intends to take the name of Kaliä'kia. These names are also the property of the various gentes, each gens having its own names. In the list of gentes given above, the names enumerated are the Kū'sött names of the ancestors. In two cases only the Qē'mtelon names have been ascertained (see p. 409). When a man possesses several Sisan'ĸн secrets he will distribute them among his children. When a girl marries, her father or mother may, after a child has been born to her, give one or several of their Sisan'ĸн secrets to her husband, as his children make him a member of the gens. When a person gets to be old he gives away all his Sisan'ĸн secrets. After any secret has been given away the giver must not use it any more. The crest and the Sisan'ĸн carvings must not be loaned to others, but each person must keep his own carvings. The only exceptions are the carved headdresses and the raven rattles, which are not the property of any particular gens.

The laws regarding the potlatch are similar to those of the Kwakiutl. The receiver of a present becomes the debtor of the person who gave the potlatch. If the latter should die the debts become due to his heirs. If the debtor should die his heirs become responsible for the debt. Property is also destroyed at potlatches. This is not returned, and serves only to enhance the social position of the individual who performed this act. It is not necessary that all the property given by a person in a potlatch should be owned by him. He may borrow part of it from his friends, and has to repay it with interest. I was told, for instance, that a man borrowed a large copper-plate and burnt it at a potlatch. When doing so he had to name the price which he was going to pay to the owner in its stead. Since that feast he died, and his heirs are now responsible for the amount named at the potlatch.

The Kū'sött is presided over by a female spirit, called Anätlikötsai'ɛ. Her abode is a cave in the woods, which she keeps shut from February till October, remaining all the while inside. In October she opens the door of her cave and sits in front of it. A woman is said to have been the first to find her. Anätlikötsai'ɛ invited her into her cave and taught

6:Boas B-5 (1886-ca. 1890)1892
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

575 her the secrets of the Ki'sitt. She wore ornaments of red cedar-bark
713 around her head, wrists, and ankles; her face was blackened, her hair
716 strewn with eagle-down. She commanded the women to dance in the same way as she saw her dancing. The people should accompany her dance with songs, and, after she had finished, they should dance with masks. She said, 'Whenever a person sees me your people shall dance the Ki'sitt. If you do not do so I shall punish you with death and sickness. In summer, while I am in my house, you must not dance the Ki'sitt.'

Ever since that time the Bilqula dance the Ki'sitt. When a man has 575 seen Amilikstmi's sitting before her cave he will invite the people to a 716 Ki'sitt. A ring made of red and white cedar-bark is hung up in his house, and the uninitiated are not allowed to enter it. Only in the evening, when dances are performed, they may look on, standing close to the door. As soon as the dances are over they must retire from the taboo house. Each Ki'sitt lasts three days.

535 The various dances performed by members of the Ki'sitt are also the 575 property of the gentes, and the right of performing them is restricted
614 to members of the gens. They must not be given to a daughter's husband, 424 as in the case with the Sisa'ka dances (see above), but belong to the members of the gens alone. They may, however, be bought and borrowed
[424] by members of the gens, who have a right to a particular dance, but who do not own it. Permission to use a mask or dance is obtained from the owner by payments. The owner may redeem the dance or the borrower
575 may return it at any time. Membership of the Ki'sitt is obtained through an initiation. At this time the novice is given his Ki'sitt name, which [551] he retains throughout life. Each gens has its peculiar Ki'sitt names,
[428] which are inherited by young persons from their parents or from other relatives. Thus a young man who had the name of Ts'pê until he was about seventeen years old obtained at his initiation the name of T'kêt'ell. I have not reached a very clear understanding of the details of the initia-
[552] tion; it seems that the dance is simply given to the novice in the same way as the Sisa'ka, this initiation being connected with a potlatch. But [787] still it seems possible that he must 'dream' of the dance which he is to perform. Only the highest degrees of the Ki'sitt have to pass through a religious ceremony of some importance. The highest degrees are the [554] tlaqi'la (the Ha'mats'a of the Kwakiutl), the O'lag (the Ki'tlamil of the Kwakiutl), and the Dê'la (the Ki'atainatl of the Ha'ilzuk). These grades are also hereditary. A Ki'sitt novice may acquire them at once at his first initiation.

When the tlaqi'la is initiated he goes into the forest, where he 575 encounters his guardian spirit. It is believed that he goes up to the sun, 785 and formerly he had to take human flesh along for food. The chiefs hold a council the night preceding the beginning of the ceremonies, and any-787 one who wanted to show his liberality offered one of his slaves to be [344] killed, in order to serve as food for the tlaqi'la. The offer was accepted and a payment of from ten to twenty blankets made for the slave. The latter was killed, and the members of the tlaqi'la cedar dressed one-half of the body before the departure of the novice to the woods. There the latter is tied up and left to fast. He may stay there for twenty or thirty days until the spirit appears to him and takes him up to the sun, 575 where he is initiated. Early one morning he returns, and is heard outside the houses. He has lost all his hair, which, it is believed, has been torn

844 fessional midwives. The child is washed in warm water. For ten days
[846] the mother must remain in this hut. Father and mother must not go [845] near the room for a year (according to Nusk'ala'ata, for ten days), else the salmon would take offence.

The child is soon given its first name. On this occasion the whole [553] tribe is invited to a feast, the name is made public, and the guests receive [552] small presents. The child retains this name until it becomes a member [554] of the Ka'aitt, when it is given its Ka'aitt name. This ceremony takes place after puberty has been reached. About this period the young man gives his first potlatch and assumes the Qa'ratala name.

881 When a girl reaches puberty she must stay in the shed which serves as her bedroom, where she has a separate fireplace. She is not allowed to descend to the main part of the house, and must not sit by the fire of the family. For four days she must remain motionless in a sitting posture. She fasts during the daytime, but is allowed a little food and drink at a very early hour in the morning. After this term she may leave her room, but only through a separate opening. She must not yet [242] come to the main room. When leaving the house she wears a large hat, [821] which protects her face against the rays of the sun. It is believed that if the sun should shine on her face her eyes would suffer. She may pick berries on the hills, but must not come near the river or sea for a whole year. She must not eat fresh salmon, else she would lose [242] her senses, or her mouth would be transformed into a long beak. She

584 If a young man wishes to marry a girl he goes, surrounded by his [431] friends, to the house of the girl's father and states his intention. His friends carry food and presents, and if the father accepts the suit he sends out a young man, who receives the food and presents and carries them into the house. Sometimes the father does not accept the offer at once. In such cases the young man may repeat the same ceremony until he is finally rejected or accepted. After the time of the marriage has [532] been agreed upon between the contracting parties, and the day preceding the marriage has arrived, the young man invites all the people to a feast, during which he states that he is to be married on the following day. He asks a number of men, generally from twenty to thirty, and four [302] women to assist him. On the following forenoon they assemble, and accompany the bridegroom to the girl's house. They sing outside, and 585 four of the men dance. All of them have their faces painted red. Finally they enter, and the bridegroom gives a large amount of property to the girl's father. Then the girl leaves her parents and goes to the bridegroom, bringing him also a large amount of property which has been [431] given to her for this purpose by her parents and relatives. He in turn gives her blankets and other apparel of the best quality, and distributes presents among her relatives. This is repeated after some time. All he has given to his bride and her relatives is repaid to him with interest. A rich girl will repay twice or three times the amount given by the man. At the time of the marriage the bride's father may promise the groom to give him his Gaax'ta sacrets as soon as the pair have their first child.
[551] The children may belong to the father's or mother's gens, as the parents may choose.

586 In case of a separation the wife refunds the amount of purchase-money. The children may stay with either parent, or part of them may go with the mother and part with the father. The decision is left to the parents and children. 586

When a person has died the corpse is washed, the face painted red, the legs are doubled up, and the arms folded over the breast. The nose-ornament of the deceased is put into his nose; his shirt is put on, the back part covering the breast and the front part turned backward. The body is placed in a box and the latter is either fastened on the lower branches of a tree or placed in a little house, which is set on posts, above the level of the ground. The face of the deceased is turned eastward. Part of his property and gifts from his friends are deposited near the grave. The masks of the deceased are burnt. His crest is carved on a memorial column, which also shows how many canoes, coppers, head-dresses, and slaves he had given away at potlatches. These objects are painted or carved on the columns. Formerly slaves were killed at the burial of chiefs. The number of slaves killed was also indicated by so many human figures on the memorial column. After burial food for the use of the deceased is thrown into the fire. This is repeated frequently during a prolonged period after the death has occurred. Whenever the friends of the deceased partake of a meal a little food is thrown down at a place between the fire and the door, where the entrance to the lower world, the home of the dead, is believed to be. 764 [301] [323] [766] [567] [775]

The bed of a mourner must be protected against the ghost of the deceased. His male relatives stick a thorn-bush into the ground at each corner of their beds. After four days these are thrown into the water. Mourners must rise early and go into the woods, where they stick four thorn-bushes into the ground, at the corners of a square, in which they cleanse themselves by rubbing their bodies with cedar-branches. They also swim in ponds. After swimming they chewe four small trees and creep through the clefts, following the course of the sun. This they do on four subsequent mornings, chewing new trees every day. Mourners cut their hair short. The hair that has been cut off is burnt. If they should not observe these regulations it is believed that they would dream of the deceased. Women when mourning scratch their cheeks with shells or stones. 765 783 [795] 765 [302]

The mourning regulations for a widower or a widow are especially strict. For four days he (or she) must fast, and must not speak a word, else the dead wife or husband would lay a hand on the mouth of the offender, who would then die. They must not go near water, and are forbidden to catch or eat salmon for a whole year. For the same length of time they must not eat fresh herring or eulachon. Widow and widower cleanse themselves in the same way as other mourners. Their shadows are considered unlucky, and must not fall on any person. [242] [828] [322]

Some time after the death of a rich or influential person his nearest relative invites the whole tribe to a potlatch. On this occasion he sings a mourning song for the deceased and gives away presents to his guests. It was explained to me that this ended the mourning, and that it was "the same as giving away the house of the deceased." 765 556

Religion and Shamanism.

The mythology of the Bilqula differs greatly from the mythologies of the other tribes of the North Pacific coast. It is impossible to say to 773 171

751 Women wear tight anklets to prevent 481 the calves of their legs from slipping down.' During their monthly 824 periods women place soft cedar-bark in the vagina. The bark is afterwards burnt in the woods. The smoke of this fire is believed to be poisonous.

177 It is evident that the culture of the Bilqula is very greatly influenced 551 by that of the Kwakiutl. The secret societies and the potlatch ceremonies 556 are almost a copy of those of the Heiltsuk'. This influence has been so 575 deep that names of even deities and of the mythical ancestors of certain
776 gentes are purely Kwakiutl words, or have at least Kwakiutl endings. Thus 771 the name Alxmkt'ikya (see p. 418) is purely Kwakiutl, meaning 'good all over the world.' K'tmk'tmkt'ikya is also a Kwakiutl word, meaning 'the rich one of the world.' The chief's name, Ma'hkylhail (see p. 419) belongs to the same class of Kwakiutl names. On the other hand, the religious ideas of the Bilqula are very curiously developed, and apparently but slightly influenced by their neighbours. The whole Mamamkt'ala tradition is peculiar to them, but has been partly adopted by the Awiky'-s'aqq, with whom the Bilqula have intermarried.

(550) One of them must wash his body, one must wash his head, and the two others hold him. In return they receive one or two blankets each. During this ceremony the qoqq'ûlû, who are described as wild men, dance around the novice. They have ropes tied around their waists, and are held by other members of the society by these ropes. Then the xwexwe'tal lead the novice into the woods, where he remains for a long time, until he meets the spirit that initiates him. It seems that during this time he is secretly led to the house in which the xwexwe'tal continue to celebrate festivals at the expense of the novice's father, and there he is taught the secrets of the society. During this time, until the return of the novice from the woods, the house is tabooed. A watchman is stationed at the entrance, who keeps out uninitiated persons. During the absence of the novice, his mother prepares cedar bark ornaments and weaves mountain goat blankets for his use. One afternoon he returns, and then his father gives a feast to let the people know that his child has returned. The latter performs his first dance, in which he uses masks and cedar bark ornaments. This dance is called xwexwe'mat. On this day the father must distribute a great number of blankets among the xwexwe'tal. The initiated are permitted to take part in the feast, and sit on one side of the house. The new member spends all his nights in the woods, where he bathes. In the spring the new member, if a man, is thrown into the sea, and after that is free from all regulations attending the initiation. One of the principal regulations regarding novices of the xwexwe'tal is that they must return from the woods in the direction in which the sun is moving, starting so that the sun is at their backs. Therefore they must sometimes go in roundabout ways. They must go backward through doors, which are sla'lequm (supernatural) against them. Frequently the sit'ca (a female shaman) is called to lengthen the door in their behalf before they pass through it. Before their dance the sit'ca must also address the earth, as it is supposed that else it might open and swallow up the dancers. It is also sla'lequm against the novice. The expression used is that the earth would "open its eyes" (k'u'nalaxta); that means, swallow the novice. In order to avert this danger, the sit'ca must "give a name to the earth," and show red paint and feathers over the place where the novice is to dance.

THE SI'LENA.

(551) The social organization, festivals, and secret societies of the Si'tcala are still more closely interwoven than they are among the Kwakiutl, and must be considered in connection. We have to describe here the potlatch, the sinax'i, and the kwiut. The sinax'i corresponds to the tsa'lasa of the northern Kwakiutl tribes, the kwiut to the ts'u'natqa. The Si'tcala believe that the potlatch has been instituted by ten deities, nine brothers and one sister, the foremost among whom is Xa'nalem, to whom now the sunrise is intrusted. He resides with the others in a beautiful house in the far east, and rises "a, a,"

every morning when the sun rises. He takes care that he rises properly. The first six of these deities are grouped in pairs, and are believed to paint their faces with designs representing moon, stars, and rainbow. In the ki'nist these deities make their appearance, and are represented by masks. Xi'utsina and Xmaxmalili'na wear the design of the full moon, indicated on the mask of Xi'utsina by a double curved line in red and black, the black outside, passing over forehead, cheeks, and upper lip. Xmaxmalili'na has a double curved line in red and black, the red outside, which passes over forehead, cheeks, and chin. Aiomki'lik'a and Aiomali'na wear the design of the crescent, drawn in red and black, with differences similar to those between the first and second masks. The fifth Q'omq'omki'lik'a and Q'u'mina have designs representing stars, both wearing the same style of mask. The seventh is Qala'sova, whose face represents the blossom of a salmon-berry bush. The next in order, Kali'lim (who wants to have blankets first), wears the design of the rainbow in black and blue. The ninth, Ai'mai'k, wears on the head a mask representing a kingfisher, and is clothed in a bird-skin blanket. The last of the series is a woman called L'ltai'qlc'ana (the eater), the sister of the others. Her face is painted with the design of a blubber filled with grease. She figures in several legends as stealing provisions and pursued by the people whom she has robbed.

The sisnai'k, which is danced at potlatches and other festivals of the class, is presided over by a being that lives in the sun. A man who had gone out hunting met the sisnai'k and was instructed by him in the secrets of the dance. When he returned, he asked the people to clean their houses and to strew them with clean sand before he connected to enter. Then he danced the sisnai'k and told the people what he had seen. He said that the being had commanded them to perform this dance and to adorn themselves when dancing with carved headdresses with trails of ermine skins, and to swing carved rattles. The man, later on, returned to the sun. Ever since that time the Hi'tsola dance the sisnai'k. Besides this, it is stated that the raven gave each class its secrets. Each class has its peculiar carvings, which are used in the sisnai'k only, and are otherwise kept a profound secret, i. e., they are the sacred possessions of each class. All class, however, wear the beautiful carved headdresses and use the raven rattles, regardless of the carving they represent. Every time the sacred objects of a class are shown to the people a potlatch is given. The sacred objects, although the property of the various class, must nevertheless be acquired by each individual—that is to say, every free person has the right to acquire a certain group of carvings and names, according to the class to which he or she belongs. Slaves and slaves' children, also illegitimate children, can not become sisnai'k. A person can not take a new carving, but must wait until it is given to him by his relatives—father, mother, or elder brother. Kwak'ale'ma, the Indian, to whom I

424 532 614 owe my information regarding the class, and who is a member of the gens Iait'stimit of the Talit'mx, stated that he had received the raven when he gave his first potlatch. At his second potlatch he received the eagle. He hoped that his mother would give him the whale at his next potlatch, and would at the same time divulge to him the secrets connected with it. In course of time, he said, he might get even others from his brother; but if the latter's children should prove to be very good, and develop very rapidly, his brother would probably give his secrets to his own children. At festivals, when a person acquires a new secret, he changes his name. Each person has two names, a kō'mat name, which remains through life, and a Xō'mtsina name, which is changed at these festivals. Thus, Nuk'nlu'sta's (which is his kō'mat name) Xō'mtsina name was AL'LEMAK'lus'aix, but at his next potlatch he intended to take the name of Kalia'kia. These names are also the property of the various clans, each clan having its own names. When a man possesses several sisan'k secrets, he will distribute them among his children. When a girl marries, her father or mother may, after a child has been born to her, give one or several of their sisan'k secrets to her husband, as his children make him a member of her clan. When a person grows old, he gives away all his sisan'k secrets. After any secret has been given away the giver must not use it any more. The crest and the sisan'k carvings must not be loaned to others, but each person must keep his own carvings. The only exceptions are the carved headdresses and the raven rattles, which are not the property of any particular clan.

The laws regarding the potlatch are similar to those of the Kwakiutl. The receiver of a present becomes the debtor of the person who gave the potlatch. If the latter should die, the debts become due to his heirs. If the debtor should die, his heirs become responsible for the debt. Property is also destroyed at potlatches. This is not returned, and serves only to enhance the social position of the individual who performed this act. It is not necessary that all the property given by a person in a potlatch should be owned by him. He may borrow part of it from his friends, and has to repay it with interest. I was told, for instance, that a man borrowed a large copper plate and burnt it at a potlatch. When doing so, he had to name the price which he was going to pay the owner in his stead. Since that feast he died, and his heirs are now responsible for the amount named at the potlatch.

The kō'mat is presided over by a female spirit, called Anatlkuta'al'x. Her abode is a cave in the woods, which she keeps shut from February till October, remaining all the while inside. In October she opens the door of her cave and sits in front of it. A woman is said to have been the first to find her. Anatlkuta'al'x invited her into her cave and taught her the secrets of the kō'mat. She wore ornaments of red cedar bark around her head, waist, and ankles; her face was blackened, her hair strewn with eagle down. She commanded the woman to dance in the same way as she saw her dancing. The people should accompany her dance with songs, and, after she had finished, they should dance with masks. She said, "Whenever a person sees me, your people shall dance the kō'sint. If you do not do so, I shall punish you with death and sickness. In summer, while I am in my house, you must not dance the kō'sint." 575 773 776 535

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

Ever since that time the Bi'lxula dance the kō'sint. When a man has seen Anaklkuta'xi'x sitting in front of her cave, he will invite the people to a kō'sint. A ring made of red and white cedar bark is hung up in his house, and the uninitiated are not allowed to enter it. Only in the evening, when dances are performed, they may look on, standing close to the door. As soon as the dances are over, they must retire from the taboo house. Each kō'sint lasts three days. 575 776 535

The various dances performed by members of the kō'sint are also property of the clans, and the right to perform them is restricted to members of the clan. They must not be given to a daughter's husband, as is the case with the sisau'k dances, but belong to the members of the clan, who have a right to a particular dance, but who do not own it. Permission to use a mask or dance is obtained from the owner by payments. The owner may reclaim the dance or the borrower may return it at any time. Membership of the kō'sint is obtained through an initiation. At this time the novice is given his kō'sint name, which is inherited by young persons from their parents or from other relatives. Thus a young man who had the name of Pō'pō until he was about seventeen years old, obtained at his initiation the name of i'kō'ut. I have not reached a very clear understanding of the details of the initiation; it seems that the dance is simply given to the novice in the same way as the sisau'k, this initiation being connected with a potlatch. But still it seems possible that he must "dream" of the dance which he is to perform. Only the highest degrees of the kō'sint have to pass through a religious ceremony of some importance. The highest degrees are the klaxō'la (the hō'mats'a of the Kwakiutl), the ō'lki (the nō'lmat of the Kwakiutl), and the dō'tla (the nō'ntsistalat of the Kwakiutl). These grades are also hereditary. A kō'sint novice may acquire them at once at his first initiation. 575 [426] [551] [428] [556] [171] [554]

When the klaxō'la is initiated, he goes into the forest, where he encounters his guardian spirit. It is believed that he goes up to the sun, and formerly he had to take human flesh along for food. The chiefs held a council the night preceding the beginning of the ceremonies, and anyone who wanted to show his liberality offered one of his slaves to be killed in order to serve as food for the klaxō'la. The offer was accepted, and a payment of from ten to twenty blankets was made for the slave. The latter was killed, and the members of the klaxō'la order devoured one-half of the body before the departure of the novice to the woods. There the latter was tied up and left to fast. He may stay there for twenty or thirty days until the spirit appears 575 785 787 [266]

names are also willed, but since their value depends on the 578 goods expended to validate them, there is seldom bitterness 614 about their allotment. Indeed, a chief who is the legal owner 553 of a designation which came from above in the beginning of time, will in many cases choose to elevate his position with [428] respect to a title of comparatively recent date. But if any person who is not a member of the ancestral family should [685] dare to use an ancestral name, all the members rise to avenge the theft, for such they feel it to be. In recent years, however, [178] this practice has become comparatively common. In such cases a man, eager to share in the glories of a myth and able to give a potlatch, has validated an ancestral name to which he has no right. The presence of the white man alone restrains the injured ancestral family. Names are sometimes lent or hired to those who are not members of the group for [426] definite sums; the recipient recompenses the individual. If [427] such names are not returned for several generations quarrels are apt to arise since the recipient claims to be the real owner and not the temporary possessor. During his tenancy of the name he is entitled to any prerogative attached to it, but he is not considered a bona fide member of the ancestral family.

Instances have occurred in which an old man or woman, believing himself to be the last survivor of an ancestral family, [428]
has donated his names and myth to those who have befriended him, or these have been taken by those who buried him. Some individuals are constantly watching to conduct the funerals of [557] friendless old people in the hope of so obtaining names. But in almost every case this leads to friction, since it is virtually impossible for an ancestral family to die out. Perhaps in the next generation, perhaps in the following one, some youth will claim descent from the first ancestors of the supposedly defunct family, and claim the myth and names embodied therein. This leads to a feud with the person, or his descendants, who has [628] received the names through aid given to the "last" of the family.

Such instances of an ancestral family becoming practically 614
621

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

593 family are liable. It is very rare for a woman to be killed in 627 a blood feud. A death is answered by a death; if two persons 682 should be slain for one murder the family which has suffered the double loss endeavours to kill another of their enemies. In [562] case of wounding, an effort is made to wound the offender, but [683] if he should be killed his family would try to avenge him. More often, one of the offender's family takes the initiative of offering goods to the injured family, "to cure the wound." If the offer is accepted, and the goods delivered properly, the matter is at an end. If a murder be committed within the ranks of the immediate family, for instance, if a brother kill a brother, revenge, if exacted, must be meted out to the actual [622] offender. If requested to do so, the leading chief of a village may offer his advice, but it is always considered that revenge concerns only the immediate family.

612 Revenge is a topic which shows clearly the essential fluidity
614 of the family. There are no well-defined degrees of relationship within which responsibility rests. Instead, everyone
[627] knows, in the open life of the community, how many persons
[682] share the family life of the individual, and they alone are held to account, or they alone demand compensation. From its very nature, the family must be a bilateral unit which, when powerful, stretches out to absorb members of the ancestral families of both mother and father.

Not only does the family thus appear constantly to be attracting to itself members of the ancestral family of either parent, but these relatives themselves are deeply interested in the affairs of the family. This is most clearly shown in the case of children who, of course, are members of the ancestral family of both their mother and father. A few days after 553 birth some relative is expected to call together the people of the village where the child is born for the bestowal and validation of an ancestral name. It is considered an evidence of
614 poverty if this is done by the father, as if his child were only [558] supported by his parents, not by a larger circle of relatives. It is immaterial whether this gathering be called by a relative

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

of the father or the mother. In June, 1922, a Bella Coola girl had reached the age of about six months without having received a name. There was much adverse criticism about the parsimony of her father's father and her mother's father, who were held equally to blame, but who had really been deterred by fear of the law prohibiting the potlatch. 612 614 553

As a child grows older he is helped in the performance of ceremonial rites by his parents and by their brothers and sisters. In this, too, it is considered a mark of poverty if only the parents take part. If a man's own children do not appear likely to carry on the traditions of his ancestral family, he has no hesitation in favouring the children of either a brother or sister, since, like his own, they are all members of the same ancestral family. Especially in Kimsquit[11] it is customary for a man to help his sisters' children; not that there is any lack of knowledge of the real father, but rather as a mark of respect and family feeling displayed by a man to his sister. Moreover, in both Bella Coola proper and in Kimsquit, it is most improper for a name which a man has raised to a position of dignity by the expenditure of much goods to be passed to his own son; it should go to a distant relative. When a father validates a name for his child it should be one long dormant. 593 604 852 [558] [614] [553]

One aspect of the manner in which the family merges imperceptibly into the ancestral family can be seen in the inheritance of names. When a man calls his relatives together to make his will he is guided in the choice of recipients by the characteristics of his children. An able son receives much from his father, but lazy children are slighted without hesitation. This is particularly true of names with which are bound up valuable dance prerogatives, whereas, as previously mentioned, ancestral names of which the importance depends 593 614 428 553

[11]According to an intelligent Bella Coola informant, a Bella Bella pays greater attention to the children of his brothers and sisters than to his own offspring, and the same man expressed the opinion that the Kimsquit practice was due to Bella Bella influence. Kimsquit informants denied this, though emphasizing the important part taken by an uncle in obtaining prerogatives for his sisters' children, in some cases to the detriment of his own, which is rare in Bella Coola. 622
* 556 broader principles of chieftainship. The first essential is to 431 consider the principles of present-giving.

PRESENTS

* 556 Consider, for example, a man who wishes to take for him-431 self one of his ancestral names, and at the same time to display certain features of his ancestral myth—a particular type of 424 house, totem-pole, or dance used by one of his forefathers.
He invites guests to his house, displays the feature of his myth, and must give a present to each to show the value of his prerogative and to demonstrate that he has not merely casually usurped the function in question. In giving a present of, for instance, $20, it is as if he said to the recipient:

"See! These are the glories of my ancestors of whom I am the descendant. I have a part in their fame. To make this valid I give you from my wealth a mere trifle, a matter of no consequence to me, who am so firmly established in the path of my ancestors."

* 556 The guest receives the money with mixed feelings. On the one hand he has received $20 as a "present." But if he wishes 431 to elevate his own position and his own prestige, together with that of his ancestors, it is incumbent on him to repay this sum with interest. Contrary to the practice among some other [171] coastal tribes, there is no fixed rate of interest among the Bella Coola. An ambitious man who seeks to become a chief will strive to the utmost to pay back with heavy interest when he himself gives a ceremony so that his fame will be carried far ● [558] and near. If he should repay only the principal, he would be regarded as having done all that was obligatory, but should he fail to do even so much, he would soon sink to a position of little consequence, no matter how lofty and distinguished his ancestral name might be.

171 In this respect there is a parallel between the Bella
* 556 Coola and ourselves. A man invited to a dinner party is not 558 compelled to return the compliment, but if, in the course of

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

time, he fails in any way to reciprocate the hospitality, he loses his place among his special associates. So, likewise, the Bella Coola who receives present after present, but fails to give any in return gradually receives smaller and smaller gifts and in time loses his social position and influence entirely. As with ourselves, too, there is a disguised feeling of contempt for the parvenu, the man who, lacking the traditional dignity attached to one of the names which came from above at the beginning of time, has elevated the fame of a more recent name by ostentatious giving. But in Bella Coola, as with ourselves, success is the great criterion, and the donor finds his influence little impaired by the lack of one of the ancient origin myths. It is dangerous to cite similarities between the social practices of divergent peoples, and this one must not be stretched too far. The pride of a man in being able to incorporate himself in the traditions of his ancestors is lacking with the host at a dinner party, nor does the latter, to any extent, attain the status of chief through his hospitality. Further, a Bella Coola will sometimes endeavour to shame the poverty of a guest by giving him a large present. Unless the recipient is willing to admit his inferiority he must repay this with a still larger gift. The original donor will then vindicate himself by increasing the value of his next gift until a fierce competition ensues. This feature of rivalry in generosity is rare in Bella Coola, and never reached the same proportions that it did among the Kwakiutl. 171 556* 558●

The following is a good instance of the manner in which a haughty man regards the acceptance of gifts. A Rivers Inlet man married a Calvert Island woman who went to live with her husband. The man's mother, to show her amiable feelings towards the marriage, frequently gave thick slices of boned spring salmon, a great delicacy, to the family of her daughter-in-law. The Calvert Island chief considered these presents an insult to him, as if the Rivers Inlet people thought that he and his people were so poverty-stricken they lived on skin and bones. To avenge this slight he made war on the Rivers Inlet Indians and slew many of them. This attitude of the Calvert 556* 578

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

*556 578 Island chief was felt by the Bella Coola to be quite natural; one of their own chiefs might have resented the insult in the same manner. This account may have no historical basis, but it is a clear example of Bella Coola sentiment.

*556 648 558 [765] Further examples may help to clarify this point. A few years ago a number of Kwakiutl Indians visited Bella Coola to perform a mourning ceremony in honour of a deceased Bella Coola who had a Kwakiutl name from his grandfather, a member of that tribe. All the natives were invited to a large house, where the visitors gave a dance according to their own ancestral myths; the songs which were used recounted the history of the Kwakiutl name of the dead man. After thus displaying their prerogatives, they felt themselves obliged, and proud, as hosts, to give presents as validation. The sum of $546 was distributed among the guests. Realizing that it would be impossible to return such a sum by holding ceremonials in Fort Rupert, the home of the Kwakiutl, the leading Bella Coola decided to return the compliment immediately. The amount to be given was discussed at great length. Appreciating the courtesy of the foreigners in thus coming to pay honour to the deceased, it was not wished to insult them by giving a larger present, which would have had the effect of intimating that the recipients considered the $546 a trifling amount. Accordingly it was finally agreed to give the visitors about $300, which was done as validation of a Bella Coola ceremony at which the strangers were present. Thus the hosts allowed themselves to be shamed as a mark of courtesy. Not to be outdone in politeness, the Kwakiutl chief made a speech, expressing his willingness to allow the Bella Coola to drive him (this occurred in the days of horses and carts) to the wharf to take the steamer. In other words, he allowed the Bella Coola to put him in their debt, as they had allowed him and his party to do with respect to the distribution of money. The visit terminated with friendly relations maintained on both sides.

123 533 The need of validating every ceremonial act by presents can be further illustrated by the following instance. When

Poor people, white guests, or others from whom no return can 553 possibly be received, share equally in the distribution; the 556* money goes to all to validate the transaction. On the other hand, X expects that the presents, if any, made to a few indi- 575 viduals after the general distribution, will be returned with interest. In selecting the recipients of these he has been animated, first, by the necessity of repaying old debts, and secondly by his desire to make good investments in the shape of presents to those likely to show their chiefly nature by returning with heavy interest. No request is ever made for such repayment, but as the transaction has been publicly an- [558] nounced, a man fears to fail to repay, since that would lower his prestige. No one may refuse a present, no matter how embarrassing it may be.

After the gifts have been distributed the songs of the [533] initiates are practised. Members of the susaok society join in with the singers; the other spectators listen attentively, full of interest, but take no part. X with his helpers then gives food to all, and they depart.

Before the coming of the white man a potlatch was a rare 535 event, and susaok members were initiated at local gatherings. 556*
The period of confinement was the same as that just described, but instead of merely practising the songs during the interval, 575 the initiates appeared and danced to them. It will be con- 177 venient here to describe that ritual, emphasizing the fact that at a potlatch, when the initiates can be confirmed in the presence of foreign guests, this preliminary rite does not take place.

After the distribution of goods the singers beat out[18] the 292 tune of any one of the initiates, and all emerge in close suc- 535 cession from the back-room, each wearing a blanket, without distinctive design, a collar of dyed and pounded cedar-bark 556* decorated with pendant weasel skins, and the distinctive susaok 575 head-dress (see Plate 15).[1/1] This consists of a circlet of grizzly bear claws, surmounted in front by a small forehead mask; from 237
the inner side of the circlet there rise a number of sea-lion

As the dances proceed, those women who have the prerogative for doing so, utter a peculiar droning cry. After dancing, the initiates return to the back-room, where they doff their attire. The ceremony concludes with the distribution of food. 535 556* 575 [424]

The initiates are now free to leave their place of concealment, as each has become a legal member of the nusok society. Some young men, sons of influential chiefs, are secluded a number of times, others but once. The oftener a youth is secluded, the greater is his prestige, because goods must be distributed on each occasion to validate his name. At the present time, there is considerable uncertainty about the exact details of the ceremony, for it has been so easy of late years to give potlatches that the simpler rite has fallen into disuse; some informants state that each initiate should emerge alone and dance by himself. This concludes the shorter ceremony, but with a potlatch the dancing is reserved until the coming of the foreign guests. [554]

Returning now to preparations for the true potlatch; it does not matter whether the ceremonies already described are carried out before or after the departure of messengers to invite guests from abroad. Although X usually consults his relatives and friends as to whom he shall invite, this is entirely optional. In giving his invitations X is actuated, first, by a desire to summon those from whom he has previously received hospitality; having accepted presents from them he must discharge the obligations or sink in social estimation. Considerations of friendship also enter into his selection, and he will likewise invite anyone whom he wishes to put to shame by a lavish display of wealth. It is taken as a matter of course that each guest will be accompanied by a number of followers, members of his family, slaves, or adherents. 556* [203] [558]

Acting on X's instructions, a herald invites the people of his village to X's house. X stands up and announces to them [203] [484]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

203 nature will try to bestow a valuable present. If a man is too
* 556 poor to give anything, he can avoid the obligation by not [535] dancing when his tune is beaten out. The presents are piled [537] together, and then the host, aided by several important chiefs, distributes them to the messengers, at the same time making laudatory speeches. The chief of the envoys receives more than the members of his crew.

Then the messenger-chief stands up and announces the names of those whom X has invited to his potlatch, using in each case the ancestral designation of the person summoned. Then the envoys, in a body, go to every house in the village. Probably all to be invited are present in the house of the chief, yet the messenger-chief must call out in the doorway of each house:

"Chief So-and-so, prepare your paddles and leave tomorrow."

Early next morning the messengers rouse those whom they have invited and, as a mark of respect, help them to carry their goods to the canoes. There is an attitude of shaming com-
• [558] bined with that of deference, since those assisted will have been placed under obligations. They also take to their canoes their own recently acquired goods. Envoys and guests set out together in their respective craft, and only separate as they near Bella Coola.

ARRIVAL OF THE GUESTS

* 556 While the canoes containing the first party of guests remain
575 at anchor to wait for high tide, the envoys proceed at once to X's house, now completely redecorated if not entirely rebuilt. Here a huge fire is blazing, and members of the sisaak society are passing in and out, making ready for the ceremony. Both [302] men and women beautify themselves by painting their faces in any designs they fancy, and by combing their hair and
[535] placing eagle down upon it. The guests at anchor lay planks across their canoes so as to form a dancing platform. Then, as the tide rises, the singers in the house beat out the tune of

*556 578 171 All day, food is being distributed in X's house with guests in almost constant attendance. Not only are large presents of food made to any chief who has previously shown generosity to X, but he also takes this opportunity to bestow insults on anyone from whom he has received the same. Among the Bella Bella and people of Rivers Inlet guests were frequently ridiculed with respect to their habitual diet or mode of life. Unquestionably, the Bella Coola sometimes did likewise, both at potlatches and at kusiut rites to which strangers were invited. Although it is dangerous to dogmatize on this point, because the practice has long since fallen into disuse, it appears highly probable that mockeries were less prevalent in Bella Coola than at other places on the coast.

*556 558 628 It is comparatively common, however, for a chief to shame a guest by a lavish disregard for valuables. News is constantly passing from town to town, so that the intended victim usually hears what is in store for him. A guest always takes valuable goods with him when he goes to a potlatch, but one who expects to be insulted takes care to have an unusually large supply. The host seats this particular visitor close to the fire, and during the afternoon or early evening he throws large quantities of grease and food upon it, to demonstrate "the warmth" and "fineness" of his house. The guest experiences physical discomfort from the extreme heat, and suffers mental pangs at having a rival boast of his power and fame. To assert his own importance he will throw goods on the fire, as if they were water to extinguish it, and the host will counter by throwing on more valuables. The contest is continued until the goods of the guest are exhausted, or the host fears to burn more lest he should not have enough left to validate the potlatch. He who has destroyed most is considered to have shown his superiority. The Bella Coola state that such rivalry was unknown [578] between chiefs of the same village.

The following is an account of a feud which took place about 1870: 556* 558 628

The people of Sauel had gone to a potlatch at Tăl-ie with a plentiful supply of goods, expecting to be insulted in revenge for a slight cast upon their host when visiting Sauel. They were allotted places close to the fire, upon which the donor cast a large quantity of oolachen grease until the intense heat almost roasted his guests. Not one of them moved; to have done so would have meant an admission that they were being made uncomfortable by their host's demonstration of wealth by this waste of valuable food. Presently, Sauăltsla, the leading chief of the visitors, stood up and called for "water" to douse the flames, meaning goods of equal or greater value, to indicate that he was as wealthy as his host and as little afraid of destroying valuables. His companions threw on the fire boxes filled with skins, but Sauăltsla desired still further to demonstrate his prowess. Hastily, he asked some of the other Bella Coola present to lend him a sea canoe (of the large type called Hăldăl), promising to repay [501] with two of the same kind. The Bella Coola agreed and the craft was carried in, the bearers showing their disregard for the host by breaking his door as they did so. The canoe was thrown on the fire and the flames mounted. Sauăltsla called upon his Tăl-ie rival to douse that fire. The latter was afraid to do so, being aware that he had barely enough goods to pay his debts at the coming distribution. Accordingly, he tacitly acknowledged the superiority of Sauăltsla, who thus rose in public esteem.

It is very difficult to discover just how often such destruction of goods took place. The Bella Coola realize that the prevalence of this practice among the Kwakiutl led to the potlatch being forbidden by law, and are reticent on the subject. Reliable informants agree that it was a fairly common custom in the early days, although it never went to the extremes prevailing at Fort Rupert and Alert Bay, where, too, was common the breaking of coppers in anger, an act unknown in Bella Coola. In other respects, also, the potlatch among the Bella Coola appears to be less important and less complicated in ritual than among the Kwakiutl, so it is highly probable that the above statement is correct. 556* 558 171

Another method of shaming a guest is to serve him, or any member of his party, so clumsily or gracelessly with food that it is spattered over him. In some cases this happens acci- 558 556*

*556 dentally, but the sentiment is that the guest has been "dis-
558 tied." To cleanse himself he gives presents to the heralds of his host, and perhaps to some of the latter's fellow-villagers, thus showing that he too is in a position to demonstrate his chief-like nature by a distribution of goods. The host usually takes the hint and is more gracious in future.

A man can render himself liable to ridicule and insult by saying that he is about to give a potlatch, and then failing to do so. Influenced by his announcement, those giving potlatches have showered presents upon the prospective donor, and if he fails to carry out his plans he will undoubtedly receive insults. Such a man, if he is wise, will carry with him to potlatches large quantities of goods to throw on the fire of his host, or to give to his host's heralds, or to use in both ways.

Thus the afternoon passes. When the people, including *556 those who are not members of the nsnek society, have assembled in the evening, a dramatic representation of some event connected with X's ancestral myth is common. A similar performance has sometimes taken place as the first event on the preceding evening. The commonest rite is connected with a whale and can be performed by those whose first forefathers came to this earth as whales, or by those whose ancestors obtained the prerogative by marriage with people who owned it. When all are seated, a number of young men rush into the house carrying with them a tree-trunk roughly hollowed out to represent a whale. The cry is raised that the animal is about to vomit, and at the same time large quantities of grease are thrown on the fire by assistants on the roof. The subterfuge is realized by all. None imagines that the whale actually throws up the grease, but the comparison is drawn between the monster voiding grease because it is fat, and a chief throwing away wealth which lesser men would consider of great worth. A display of this kind increases the fame of X, the concept being the usual one, that he has demonstrated his nobility of mind.

Now begins the distribution of the large quantities of goods

he may now repay with one hundred and fifty blankets. The amount of the original present will be announced, so that it is made known that he is repaying with 50 per cent interest. This completes the transaction. The man who receives the additional fifty blankets is not required to repay these, though he may endeavour to do so, should he wish to add to his own fame. It is sufficient if X pays back the principal only, though in that case he does not increase his prestige. No claim is ever made for the repayment of an investment present; repayment is so obviously to the advantage of the debtor that there is no necessity for dunning. A man who did so would expose himself to the ridicule of the community; it would demonstrate that he thought in terms of goods, whereas a chief is expected to give presents as if they were a mere nothing. 426 556* [558]

On rare occasions a chief has been unable to repay his investment presents. In the autumn of 1911, a Bella Bella chief, aided by his son, prepared to give a potlatch, and the news spread far and wide. But during the summer the young man accidentally shot himself while deer-hunting. The father realized that, bereft of his son's assistance, he would be unable to repay even the principal of his indebtedness. He wept with grief. A disgrace of this kind affects the man and all who are in any way related to him, so he called upon his relatives, and they gave him sufficient money to save the situation. In such a case, nobody is compelled to contribute aid, but a feeling of compassion is at work, as well as a vague sense of family pride. One Bella Coola gave this chief $10, although all that was remembered about his relationship to the Bella Bella man was that one of his ancestors had married a woman from the village of the Bella Bella chief. Particular inquiries were made to ascertain whether or not the disgrace of failure to repay would fall on the ancestral family and whether they were legally bound to contribute. Such is decidedly not the Bella Coola concept; only feelings of pride and affection govern the contributions. Assistance of that kind is given without witnesses, 426 556* 558 [614]

NE5 Bellacoola NE5

426 hence repayment or non-repayment does not affect the standing of the debtor in the community. The giver expects no
556 return, but should he come to financial straits he would have [558] no hesitation in asking aid from the Bella Bella chief. He expects, moreover, that the latter will contribute to the expenses of his funeral. This would be optional, as repayment of a non-ceremonial present concerns the donor and recipient alone, without effect on the status of either in the community. In this instance, if the old man had died soon after his son, his debts would not have been paid, since there were surviving no immediate relatives. Sons or other near kinsmen always settle the debts of dead parents out of family pride, but it is considered most improper for the creditors to think about re-
[558] payment. By giving they have shown their power, the question of return is the concern of the family of the deceased recipient.

Very rarely does the donor of a potlatch fail to return his investment presents except through oversight. In spite of every precaution, errors occur, and these are said to be caused either by a supernatural being, itself invisible, rising between [176] the donor and his guest, hiding the latter, or by Snuqualnkaiste stealing away his thoughts. Unless the donor wishes
[578] to insult a guest, he will give him presents later on, and that ends the matter. But if he does not do so, the slighted man 426 may return the insult, and thus feuds are often generated that
556 may lead to war between tribes. About 1860 it is said
648 that a conflict between the people of Bella Bella and Rivers Inlet was caused in that way. In the autumn of 1921, a Bella Coola chief insisted on dancing at a Bella Bella potlatch, although it was commonly known he did not have the necessary goods for distribution to validate his dance. The hosts waxed sarcastic, taunts were answered by taunts, and only the presence of some white men prevented bloodshed. Relations between the two tribes are still strained as a result of this [128] incident. The Bella Coola chief was subject to spells of insanity, and danced during one of these. According to the

Bella Coola, the Bella Bella should have taken this into account, along with the man's generosity on previous occasions, and overlooked his remissness.

Cases have been known of a "stupid" man endeavouring to increase his prestige by giving many potlatches when unable to pay his debts. Such a one is laughed at for his stinginess, which is not the attribute of a chief, and is given only small presents.

It must be clearly understood that debts publicly incurred, in other words investment presents received at any ceremony, must be publicly returned, if the debtor is to gain the public esteem granted to one who pays back with interest. But everyone cannot give a potlatch; hence any young man desirous of returning his obligations, and of rising in public favour, can do so at a potlatch given by somebody else. Guests are present from abroad, so his discharge of indebtedness is made known farther afield than if he had done so at a local gathering, and the donor has the additional satisfaction of being able to give to these strangers. Sometimes as many as ten young men will ask X for permission to pay their debts at his potlatch. Such is never refused, because it means more ceremonial, and greater interest, which indirectly increase X's prestige. A young man who has been taken to a foreign potlatch as an adherent of a guest always receives presents, and if he repays these with interest his name begins to become known, especially as his return payments are unexpected. It is thus that a man whose chiefly name (or names) has been dormant for generations, can begin to restore it. Thanks to presents he gives at X's potlatch, he will in return receive large gifts, until finally he is able to give a potlatch himself. After X has paid his own indebtedness the debts of others are settled. In each case the speaker announces the amount received on such and such an occasion and the amount returned. Thus all present are able to estimate the generosity of the payer, a chiefly attribute. When a young man plans to give his first potlatch it is customary for the older chiefs of his village to advise whether he has

556 of his own affairs.

After paying his debts X still has many heavy expenses in connection with the cosmi initiates, and the young people for whom he is obtaining seats. Goods for these purposes have been put on one side. The remainder he now proceeds to give away as investment presents. His exhibition of ancestral prerogatives, and the guise in which his ancestors are now living, as eagle, raven, whale, or such like, have been duly validated by the presents given on the preceding evening, and his social status has been cared for by the payments to his creditors and other creditors. Thus investment presents are not essential, though a man always endeavours to give them, both for economic and social reasons. There are no definite laws regarding their distribution. X is guided in his choice of recipients[27] by the following considerations:

(1) If a certain chief is likely to give a potlatch soon he knows that a present given him will be returned with interest.

(2) He desires to give something to a chief from whom he has often received favours.

(3) He wishes to ingratiate himself with a powerful chief by presents.

421 (4) He wishes to give presents to a chief with whom he is 556 not on friendly terms. Unless the latter reciprocates, it will be considered that X has shown his superiority.

●551 (5) Usually an important chief will receive more valuable presents than one of lesser rank. This custom is not governed by any fixed scale, and an important chief may be deliberately slighted, if X thinks that he has not shown him, X, sufficient respect.

It is considered the height of folly to give presents without due regard to their return.

The amount of gifts depends entirely on the wealth and desires of X. If he wishes to increase his fame, he will endea-

[27] Only one present is given to each man, irrespective of the number of names he may have. The Kwakiutl are said to give a gift for each designation.

wear to give valuable presents, but he need not give any. It is a deep disgrace to any man to be unable to return these presents. Nothing is said, nor does the donor take active steps to receive his returns, but the influence of the recipient perceptibly wanes. It is expected that a heavier rate of interest will be paid on presents received many years before repayment, but again this is a matter of individual volition. The debts of a man who dies while owing for goods received at potlatches are scrupulously discharged by his family. If they fail to do so, their own influence is lessened. 426 556* 558

One method of reducing the value of an investment present can be used by a man who feels unable to repay a large gift. The uncle of an elderly Bella Coola was once guest at a Kimquit potlatch, where he received, as an investment present, a fine large canoe and two hundred blankets. Not wishing to incur so large a liability he at once returned fifty of the blankets as his host for distribution among the guests. Consequently, he was expected to make return for only one hundred and fifty blankets, with whatever interest he desired. This action tended to lower his prestige, since it acknowledged his inability or unwillingness to repay his present. The chief in question, being firmly established in his chiefly status, did not fear to do this, though one of lower rank would have hesitated to confirm his inferiority.

It is on the value of the goods distributed in these three types of presentation, namely, recompense for work done, repayment of debts, and investment presents, that the importance of the potlatch, and consequently of X himself, is virtually judged. These distributions of presents are for the potlatch as a whole, including the return of the dead and the intangible prestige of X; the directions which follow are to validate specific transactions which can be omitted. In one or two families the whole course of the potlatch is changed, since the members have the prerogative of distributing their presents outside the house. In such a case the giving is done during the day instead of at night. Details of this ritual, 426 556* [184 424]

sion by repeating loudly a few words, or even phrases, from the speeches being delivered, or calling on the audience to notice what has just been said and to listen attentively. A white man would be annoyed at such interruptions, but the Bella Coola consider them evidences of attentiveness. 203 556*

The making of comments is a duty performed at every type of ceremony, but it is indispensable at potlatches; since a chief depends on the heralds to emphasize and explain the points of his family history which are being displayed. One intelligent man likened their functions to a compass, constantly guiding the course of ceremonial life. Without a herald a chief would be as useless as a ship round on the ocean with no hand to steer. Although the principal duty of heralds is to extol the actions of a chief, they can, and are expected to, deride one who fails to carry out the customary requirements. Cases have occurred in which influential men have so far forgotten their function of generosity as to fail to invite their fellows after killing a deer or other large animal; or women have declined to share their abundant berries. Nothing is said at the time, but when next the people have come together for some ceremony, a herald refers to the omission under so slim a disguise that everyone is aware of his meaning. This public ridicule lowers the prestige of a chief to such an extent that he is careful not to offend again. Not many years ago, a certain Kimsquit chief failed to ask others to share some mountain goats which he had killed; at the first opportunity a herald referred to himself as Yaki, Mountain Goat, and all present realized that he was really alluding to the one who had been remiss. 203 556* 558 626 [224] [222]

Heralds must exercise care in their witticisms at the expense of chiefs because, unless public opinion is with them, the point of the remark is lost, and they expose themselves to the wrath of the person offended. Nevertheless, heralds always strive to cause merriment, and often take risks with this aim in view. They try to make humorous remarks, and also to cause amusement by their action. As already described, the donor of a potlatch may throw to one of them a dish containing liquid food 203 522 556*

435 owner with a statement of its history and the amount expended 437 on it. The purchase of a copper is, therefore, a good business
*556 transaction, and it might be assumed that a chief with keen [171 commercial instinct would endeavour to acquire as many as 189] possible. This is said to be the case in Fort Rupert, but in Bella Coola public opinion is averse to the obtaining of coppers unless for use at potlatches. As every ambitious chief hopes to give potlatches, he can always claim that the acquisition of a copper is for this end, and that the sale of it is from a kindly desire to assist a fellow-chief who is nearer the desired goal than he himself. Consequently, the sale of coppers is tolerably common, and a chief is not considered to be mercenary unless he sells too frequently.

426 The intending donor of a potlatch can now proceed to the *556 ceremony, secure in the possession of a copper worthy to be thrown on the fire after the passage of his deceased relative. In addition, he may own another copper of too small value for this purpose. As described in the last chapter, he repeatedly calls together the inhabitants of his own village to rites which he validates by the distribution of presents, and at which he also gives away investment presents. He may decide to use his second copper for this purpose. All investment presents, [556] which are given only to men of standing in the community, must be repaid with interest unless the recipient is willing to decline in popular estimation; but when a gift of this kind consists of a copper, a return of 100 per cent is expected on the transaction. Borrowed of a copper in such circumstances is not spoken of as an investment present, ddlmkawdm, but as dwanqf, which has the definite significance of something that must be returned with 100 per cent interest. If the value of the copper were $25 before this borrowed, it is now $50, since the new owner must repay this amount to the chief planning to give the potlatch. The new owner can use the copper in any way he desires; if he repays a previous indebtedness, he records $50 by giving it; whereas if he borrows it as dwanqf, announcement is made that its value is $50, and he expects to

Na'ast, "The Inhospitable One." Her husband received this reputation owing to his wife's manners, so she advertised what had been said about him.

Nuphinlsikin, "Heedlessly Deaf." This woman's mother-in-law claimed that she deliberately failed to hear what she was told to do, and applied the above epithet to her. The daughter-in-law confounded her by taking it as her own name. [606]

When a name of this type is assumed it is always announced when, where, and for what purpose it was first created. 553

A description has already been given of the actual ritual by which X bestows the goods acquired from the repurchase of Y, but it is necessary to enlarge on the prohibition against their use for the direct benefit of one of the children of the couple. The theory is that the goods bind the marriage contract and express in a practical and lofty form the kindly sentiments with which Y's relatives regard her husband, and the bond between the two families, hence they must be used solely for the benefit of him and his relatives. A man usually applies these goods to initiate the children of his brothers or sisters into the ranks of the ssaak or kusiut. It is unthinkable for goods to be delivered without an exposition of Y's family's glories, but if this should ever take place, there would be no difficulty in applying them to the direct benefit of her children. When used, for example, to make a child of X's brother a saaak, he is a living testimony of the noble way in which Y's relatives have done that which is fitting for the family of her husband. Due to accidents in announcing and storing of presents, it sometimes happens that those obtained by the repurchasing of Y are used for the benefit of her own children. Unless this error is corrected, the child could always be shamed by having it said: 556 583 [558]

"You are a mere nobody. The goods expended in the

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

556 repurchase of your mother have become nothing beneath your 583 feet."

When such an accident occurs, the relatives of X take some [558] future occasion to give presents to validate his child, with the announcement:

"The goods used from the repurchase of his mother have become nothing beneath his feet. We hereby supply that deficiency."

Thus it is demonstrated that the relatives of both parents are interested in his welfare, so that his path is clear before him.

553 Many women are only repurchased once, but an effort is 556 made to do this frequently since the more times, the greater
583 her prestige. After several repurchasings it is felt that the names and other prerogatives "dragged across" by Y have become valueless. But since new names have been taken to her husband on each occasion, the marks of friendship between the two families are still plain. Then it is that those first transmitted can be revived by relatives of Y, unless, of course, X has validated them for his children. If there is only one repurchasing, the names remain the definite property of X. This is not a clearly formulated law, merely a sentiment that the earlier names have been covered by those later given, and that accordingly Y's relatives, having done what was proper, can now use the titles once more. There is a constant interchange of names and privileges between families related by marriage.

556 It is virtually impossible to over-estimate the importance
583 of this rite of repurchase among the Bella Coola, one of the few customs preserved tenaciously amid the ruins of their [182] ancient culture. The writer was forcibly struck with the following instance which occurred while he was in Bella Coola:

About fifteen years before, a young man and woman had married with due formality. After three children had been [586] born, the mother took to drink and vice until her husband at last repudiated her, retaining possession of the children. The woman, weakened by disease, divorced by her husband, and

588 it, although it is customary for the parents of a wife to exhibit
556 their wealth on several occasions.

What are the advantages of such an agreement to the two parties? The husband receives considerable assistance, both in actual goods and in ceremonial prerogatives. Moreover, his vanity is gratified by the desire shown by others to have him as husband of their daughters. The advantages to the wife are more difficult to describe. Financially, her relatives always lose, yet they consider that the prestige gained by their daughter as wife of a mighty chief fully compensates for their monetary loss. Accordingly, they take pains to have a daughter married several times before puberty, either simultaneously or [595] in succession. Thus there is a form of ceremonial polyandry existing in Bella Coola at the present day. No ceremonial marriage takes place after puberty. In later years, when the [554] wife grows up, marries, and has children of her own, their status is increased materially by the pre-puberty marriages of their mother. They address her fictitious husband as "father," and his children as brother or sister, although there are no incest prohibitions with regard to them. A chief sometimes arranges the bestowal of names or other prerogatives on the children of a fictitious ex-wife, but such favours are too uncertain to provide a motive for the prevalence of the rite. Its value rests on the esteem attached to a woman whose relatives have shown their wealth and prowess by marrying her several times. When her children quarrel with their playfellows, it is common to hear one boast:

[558] Occasionally the relatives of a fictitious bride are unable to provide the goods to repurchase her from her husband and the girl remains disgraced for life. In no circumstances has her husband any claims to marital rights with her, and in due course she can marry someone else; but it is never forgotten that she was not rebought from her husband. In 1916 a girl about four years of age was married to a man of sixty, who at the time gave her relatives $80 and a motor boat. She had

if the latter agrees to undertake the commission, he must next obtain a slave, a matter of no difficulty if he is at all wealthy. An effort is made to find a victim from the tribe that has committed the murder, though any alien will suffice. The details are worked out with great care so that the slave is sent to the river for water, or on some other errand at the time the call comes to the Cannibal. A shout is raised, and the uninitiated hurriedly run out of the house, followed by the dancer and a body of athletic kukusiut, who pounce on the unsuspecting foreigner. The Cannibal cuts his throat, and the corpse is carried back to his house, where all members of the society are assembling. Part of the body is cut off, then the kukusiut accompany the Cannibal to every house of the village. He carries the mutilated remains, and the uninitiated readily believe that he has devoured the missing portion. The corpse is later dismembered and the bloody pieces displayed, convincing proof of the gruesome meal. It is needless to say that they are carefully buried where there is no danger that they will be found. The rite then proceeds in the usual manner.

If two biting Cannibals, or their parents, quarrel, they may be shamed into killing and "eating" a slave. Angry words lead to insults, insults to scorn at each other's prowess, until one of the Cannibals throws a stone at the feet of the other, an action which has the significance of:

575* 796* 567 578

"Eat that!"

Since a stone is always symbolic of a slave, the Cannibal so taunted knows what is expected. If he accepts the challenge, he throws a stone at his adversary's feet, bidding him do likewise. The one challenged soon receives a call and kills a slave in the manner previously described; his rival must do the same unless he is willing to admit himself outdone. The occasional killing of a slave under such circumstances does not give to either the right of doing so habitually. Of course the challenged individual is not bound to accept, but if he declines the "dare," he sinks in popular estimation. This

None of the first settlers was sent down to earth as a wasp, but several, including Nuxkila, were guided and assisted by these insects to such an extent that they have been regarded as crests.

*558 (c) It is customary, when quoting this song, to add this final remark. It is related [424] that, many years ago, a Kimsquit man used his wasp prerogative, but was shamed at the potlatch by being inundated with goods from a rival. Since that time, none of his descendants has dared to use the right and the admonition against doing so has become almost proverbial.

differentiate between cross- and ortho-cousins, and the unsystematic groupings of nephews and nieces show "family," as opposed to classificatory, principles. Finally, rhetorical terms for the ancestral family, for many ancestors, and many descendants, correspond to the importance of a large number of relatives in Bella Coola thought. 601 [602]

In many parts of the world the classificatory system of relationship occurs where the community is divided into clans. The occurrence of some of these features among the Bella Coola raises the question of whether or not they should be regarded as survivals from an earlier clan form of social organization. The Bella Coola may once have had clans, but their relationship system does not furnish any real evidence to this effect. The reciprocal terms really have the significance, "Relation by marriage of the same generation," or "of a generation once removed," a form of address which does not require explanation in any ancient form of social organization. Moreover, the importance of the eldest child, as potential transmitter of the glories of the ancestral family, is sufficient reason for differentiating brothers and sisters in terms of their relative ages. This feature suggests that in former times this was more important than it has been in the recent past. It is not implied that the Bella Coola never had a clan system, as such may have been the case many generations ago, but their kinship terminology can be explained without that hypothesis. The somewhat wide application to cousins of terms which are properly limited to brothers and sisters may easily have been derived from a process of copying. The Bella Coola are well acquainted with the clan system of the northern coastal tribes, so that it is by no means impossible, or unlikely, that they should have adopted the principle of applying the same kinship term to many individuals, and hence to members of their own ancestral families. Finally, the somewhat vague and unsystematic application of terms to relatives according to whether or not they are members of the immediate family, is a feature not at all surprising in view of the essential fluidity of Bella

177 fathers. Inherited beliefs are too deep-rooted to pass away 771 entirely within a few generations. Even those who claim to have adopted the new faith remain convinced of the potency [181] of magic, and of the existence of those supernatural creatures which do not actively conflict with the white man's creed.
Such lack of consistency is a world-wide trait, particularly intelligible among the Bella Coola whose philosophy abounds in contradictions, dependent upon statements handed down in the origin myths of different families.

626 The Bella Coola are constrained not only by the omnipresence of supernatural beings; they are constantly subjected [181] to the influence of their fellows. They are far less individualistic than white people. A chief may boast that he can do as [622] he pleases, that he can disregard the restrictions of lesser men; he often does so, but only because public opinion recognizes that he has reached a position of eminence by giving many potlatches. The duly validated warrior is brave because he [703] feels that everyone is aware of his valour. The man who performs some ceremony in accordance with an ancestral myth [769] incorporates himself with his forbears, and is strengthened by the conviction that he has gained their support and approbation. In every phase of life, a person is profoundly affected 177 by the approval or disapproval of his neighbours. At present 626 the construction of small houses, each occupied by a single 342 family, makes it possible for a man to hide himself, or to do work unknown to the rest of the community. This lessens the force of public opinion, although it is even now more potent than conscience in checking anti-social acts. Formerly, in communal houses, every action was fully known, making individual freedom of thought and act virtually impossible. A man [602] is chiefly influenced by his relatives who take a great share in what the white man would consider purely family affairs. The effect of the group upon the individual must not be overlooked, nor can it be over-stressed in a study of these people.

177 The education and conversion of the younger men have 626 enormously lessened their reliance upon their fellows. In former 182
561

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

times, older relatives were revered, not only as senior members 177
of the ancestral family, but as those most familiar with myths 626 and other cherished possessions. With the spread of new ideas, 182
the young people no longer respect the lore of their elders, and 561 consequently do not heed their admonitions and advice. Theoretically, such self-reliance would seem desirable, but in practice it has led to unfortunate results. A young man, considering himself superior to the older people, glories in acting on his own initiative, but too often he lacks the requisite strength of character to guide his own life. If he wishes to drink, he does so; if he desires to marry, he chooses his mate without con- [581] sidering the transmission of ancestral rights which stabilized unions in former times; if he tires of his wife, he deserts her for another; if he cheats or steals, he is no longer restrained by relatives who fear disgrace. The elders, incapable of stemming the tide, watch sadly and ask seriously whether the coming of the white man has brought compensation for the loss it has caused. It is deplorable that the emancipation of the younger men and women has taken place before the development of the sense of individual responsibility and conscience which public opinion formerly rendered less necessary. Christianity provides a moral code for those who are fully converted, but for the many in the transition stage, the break-down of the old system of family influence has been tragic.

Profound religious beliefs and lack of individual initiative 181 are shared by all Bella Coola with the exception, perhaps, of a 177 few of the younger people who, having been educated at white man's schools, have adopted the new outlook unconditionally. In most characteristics they display as wide variability as any 577 other people. In truthfulness, for example, they range from one extreme to the other. As the writer became familiar with 124 the older men, he found it possible to recognize without difficulty the strength of some and the weakness of others. There are liars, but they can be easily detected owing to their lack of finesse. It is a pleasure to record the reliability of the author's friends and informants.* Their veracity was checked repeat-

to their forefathers. Profound as these material changes have been, those of a psychological nature have been even more important. New worlds have been thrown open to them, stimulating ideas have been brought to their attention, and they have realized for the first time that the world is infinitely larger than they had imagined. Hand in hand with this extension of knowledge has gone disbelief in their own ancient lore. The white man, whose superiority and mechanical skill they admit, positively denies the actuality of their mythology, and laughs at the dramatic performances which were wont to fill the winter with engrossing interest. Such rites can flourish only in an attitude of profound belief: this has been so shaken that the dances continue listlessly, a mere shadow of a once living art. The young people were the first to embrace a scepticism that has rapidly grown into disbelief of the faith of their ancestors, and a half-concealed scorn for their elders, the upholders of the old customs. Worst of all, prohibition of the potlatch has made it impossible for a man to reach a position of social eminence. Moreover, since the holding of any type of ceremonial requires a distribution of gifts, formal gatherings of all kinds have become virtually impossible; even marriages have no longer the social support that formerly made them so lasting.

These cumulative blows would be enough to shake any civilization, and that of the Bella Coola has been entirely unable to adjust itself to the new conditions. The young people, having lost respect for their elders, are deprived of the advice and support essential to the continuity of culture. They ape the white man's dress; they want his mechanical devices, but have failed to assimilate them. For example, a gramophone in a Bella Coola house is an anachronism, while several similar articles spoil the old picture but do not provide a new one. Seeking to copy the new ways thrown open to them, they have achieved the outward show but not the substance, and in so doing have destroyed their own culture. In the old days they were ambitious to hold potlatches and willing to work steadily towards that goal; now, new desires have not kept pace with and eagles whom he invites to devour it. In so doing, he does not address them by their usual names, but calls Wolf, Ałkwi-gawum, "The Devourer of Meat Which He Does Not Kill," that is, "The Biting Scavenger"; and Eagle, Axałkayuxmarnum, "The Constant Eater," that is, "The One Who Eats before He Is Hungry." Next morning the flesh has been devoured and the hunter believes his guests have eaten it. Animals and birds, being supernatural, can hear the words of mortals and read their thoughts. The significance of these actions is that animals have the power to conceal themselves, so a hunter must gain their favour before he can hope to succeed. Belief in the efficacy of such customs as these is rapidly falling into decay and bear meat is now often eaten, but the skull is carefully placed in an evergreen tree near where the animal is slain, so that it may come back to life.

Fish, likewise, are immortal. In autumn the streams are choked with dead and dying salmon, but the Bella Coola know that they are not really dead, they have merely shed their worthless blankets in accordance with Ałquntźw's decrees. At that season of the year he causes the rivers to rise so that they will sweep away these useless and outworn cloaks.

Although the salmon, from the kindness of their hearts, allow human beings to feast on their blankets, yet they have certain likes and dislikes which are carefully observed. From the time the first spring salmon appear (I, pp. 759-761) until the rising of the July moon, women are not allowed to eat them or to go near the river. Men may eat the flesh, but instead of throwing the bones to dogs, they carefully return them to the river saying:

"Please come back tomorrow."

If this is inconvenient, bones can be thrown into the woods with impunity.

Salmon, like men and animals, live a human-like existence in their homes far beneath the surface of the ocean. They lack and desire earthly objects, especially pounded cedar-bark (see Appendix A) to use as sponges for their children, so the Bella Coola throw pieces of it and eagle down on the water.

593 family are liable. It is very rare for a woman to be killed in 627 a blood feud. A death is answered by a death; if two persons 682 should be slain for one murder the family which has suffered the double loss endeavours to kill another of their enemies. In [562] case of wounding, an effort is made to wound the offender, but [689] if he should be killed his family would try to avenge him.
More often, one of the offender's family takes the initiative of offering goods to the injured family, "to cure the wound." If the offer is accepted, and the goods delivered properly, the matter is at an end. If a murder be committed within the ranks of the immediate family, for instance, if a brother kill a brother, revenge, if exacted, must be meted out to the actual [622] offender. If requested to do so, the leading chief of a village may offer his advice, but it is always considered that revenge concerns only the immediate family.

612 Revenge is a topic which shows clearly the essential fluidity 614 of the family. There are no well-defined degrees of relationship within which responsibility rests. Instead, everyone [627] knows, in the open life of the community, how many persons [689] share the family life of the individual, and they alone are held to account, or they alone demand compensation. From its very nature, the family must be a bilateral unit which, when powerful, stretches out to absorb members of the ancestral families of both mother and father.

Not only does the family thus appear constantly to be attracting to itself members of the ancestral family of either parent, but these relatives themselves are deeply interested in the affairs of the family. This is most clearly shown in the case of children who, of course, are members of the ancestral family of both their mother and father. A few days after 559 birth some relative is expected to call together the people of 612 the village where the child is born for the bestowal and validi-614 zation of an ancestral name. It is considered an evidence of [551] poverty if this is done by the father, as if his child were only supported by his parents, not by a larger circle of relatives.
It is immaterial whether this gathering be called by a relative

the food and goods distributed, since it was winter and the 553
people were in dire straits on account of the destruction of all 556 * their stores. In consequence, the uncle decided to make a new name for his nephew, Ikdmi, "Charred Wood." By virtue of the goods expended this name became an honourable title, and was maintained by lavish presents. Any similar incident connected with a potlatch can be made the origin of a designation. Another example of a manufactured name is one derived from a peculiarity of the man giving the potlatch. A number of years ago a chief was jeered at by his associates on account of the frequency with which he had to visit the toilet. When next he gave a potlatch he created the name Ilpmlu, "The Toilet One," and gave great dignity to the designation by presents.

pended in obtaining it with respect to a certain name, it is 556 *
obvious that names and seats are closely associated. A man who wishes his son to succeed to his own location in the house seats the youth, as has been described, at his feet. It may be a matter of years before he actually takes his father's position, but during that time he is treated with respect; he is still a commoner, but it is recognized that his parent considers him likely to "make good" and become a true chief by ability to give presents. Should he fail to do so, inevitably his influence wanes, in spite of his name and duly validated seat. He keeps the latter, but it is no longer considered one of importance. Thus, too, the course of names from generation to generation [551]
is a series of curves; sometimes one is on a pinnacle of glory when "made strong" by a powerful chief, but in the next generation it may fall to the dust through ownership by a [195] weakling. As the Bella Coola express it: "It has become homogenitized."

A woman is rarely established in a seat, and usually only when a chief has no sons or other near male descendants. In [522] ● such a case she receives an ancestral name and has the same status as a male chief. At the present time one important

1:bk:Hewitt E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

554 chief had thus obtained a seat for his daughter, as well as ones
* 556 for his two sons. But usually a woman continues to use the
● 562 ancestral name given to her in infancy until she is able to assist her husband in a potlatch, when a name is validated for [553] her (see I, p. 410). The ancestral names of the first women to occupy this earth are reserved for women and, like men's names, vary in prestige according to the prowess of their owners. Most names given to children, though embodied in [551] origin myths, are applicable to either sex; and these are the common designations of women. Cases are known in which a woman has assumed an ancestral name if her brother has allowed it to fall into ill-repute through failure to give potlatches.

554 With such a fluid system, no fixed line can be drawn be-
* 556 tween chief and commoner. But after his fourth potlatch a man's influence in the community has become so great that 622 he will usually feel justified in having the carpenters make for [559] him a material seat. There is nothing to prevent a person having one made for him before he has given the requisite number of potlatches, but too rapid assumption may render him liable to the scorn of the community through his failure to show himself sufficiently "strong." The contempt shown [624] to anyone attempting to usurp too lofty a place is a strong deterrent to a proud young man.

[532] On the material seat are carved the man's ancestral crests, [552] in other words the forms in which his first ancestors came to earth, or some of the beings with whom they came in contact. To show these is a matter of pride, but unless the display is fittingly validated, the man's own dignity will be lowered, as well as that of his ancestors. Construction of a seat is particularly common when a man is establishing himself in the central position behind the fire, and claims this to be where his first ancestor sat. Others among the first people may have chosen seats in other parts of the house, and in these, likewise, a man who is taking his ancestral name may have a material seat constructed. Establishment in such a position increases a chief's feeling of mental superiority, as if strength-

171 lieved that all the Kitkatla chiefs were powerful, but Tsakis
+ 556 was the greatest of all. It is said that one of his prerogatives[1]
622 was to exercise jus primae noctis whenever a Kitkatla was 829 married. Without question, tales of this chief's prowess have become exaggerated in transmission, none the less they show that the Bella Coola realize the great importance of the northern chiefs. Concerning their nearer neighbours, the Bella Bella, the Bella Coola understand the way in which the members of a family combine to help their chief in the giving of presents. They say that the Bella Bella consider the Bella Coola practice of each one endeavouring to make himself a chief to be foolish in the extreme. Such is also said to be the opinion among the Kwakiutl, who support their contention that in Bella Coola all are chiefs, from the fact that flooring exists under the seats of all, whereas in Fort Rupert, their home, such occurs only beneath the seats of chiefs.

262 Corresponding to the extreme paucity of functions pos-
574 sessed by Bella Coola chiefs, their prerogatives are likewise
622 scanty. Indeed, they take their validated seats only during certain rites of the secret society connected with chiefs, at potlatches, and at ceremonial meals. These last occur whenever a deer or seal is killed; the latter is considered a great delicacy.[2]
[225] Anyone can kill a seal, but it would be unthinkable for a Bella
[252] Coola to share its flesh with his immediate family only. The animal is cleaned, the hole made by bullet or spear carefully [203] plugged, and the carcass boiled whole in a large box. Meanwhile a herald (I, p. 244) summons the chiefs to the house where the successful hunter lives. If the meal is to consist merely of one small seal, only a few chiefs are invited, those of greatest influence through their possession of "strong" seats. When
• [562] several seals have been killed, the number invited is correspondingly larger, but no woman may partake unless she ranks

[1] This is said to have been a personal prerogative, not shared by all chiefs, and requiring validation by valuable presents.

[178] [2] Only traces of the rite described in this paragraph occur at the present time. In fact, the reservation of seal meat for chiefs alone was discontinued towards the close of the last century.

McDowell R-1 (1922-1924)948

as a man by the duly validated ownership of a chief's name in her own right. Formerly a slave was never allowed to eat seal, unless he had been the slayer. If many seals are killed, chiefs from adjacent villages are sometimes invited. The chiefs seat themselves according to their proper positions and are first served with the blood-stained grease that floats to the top of the water as the meat is boiling. When cooked, the meat is cut into strips, measured in terms of so many finger breadths, according to the number of guests. The cure run down each fore-flipper, so that each receives a narrow strip including one of the toes. The head is always given to the herald.[1]

Chiefs are also accustomed to meet for the discussion of matters connected with the winter ceremonial; on such occasions their number may be augmented by men of influence in the secret society, though they do not rank as chiefs. Such a meeting is always called when a new member is to be initiated into the hoolat society. If there is difference of opinion the influence of even a nanlit chief is outweighed by a man of importance in the society. The matter is discussed by all present and a decision reached by general agreement. It is difficult for a white man to understand how such is possible without either a vote, or general recognition by all that the views of some individual must be accepted. The writer was present at one such meeting, and was struck by the manner in which, after considerable, and at times heated, discussion, a consensus of opinion was reached, and accepted even by those who had proposed a contrary course.

Near every village is a place where the chiefs hold such meetings. All the inhabitants know the general locality, but unstandard. Boys and girls helped their parents, and there was no definite age at which they ceased to do so. The fluidity of the Bella Coola system was contrary to any standardization. The more important a chief became, the more did he receive from dependent relatives, but the more did they expect in the way of "return presents." It was advantageous to be generous, within the family circle as well as without, since life was so public that every transaction even of a "private" nature, was well known. Unquestionably, a greedy and strong-minded individual must frequently have taken advantage of help from his kinsmen, but there was no strict code of ethics to expect in this. In brief, it may be said that the acquisition of wealth was an unstandardized, individual, matter; its distribution was likewise according to individual volition, although within a rigidly defined tribal pattern.

[1] Every effort was made to secure the accuracy of this account, but errors must have crept in on account of the length of time which has elapsed since the ceremony. Pony cooked not in full detail.

Sacred Sources

The ancestral names that chiefs desire to raise to a position of eminence are usually embedded in myths dealing with the first settlement of this earth, names which belong, or has been stated, to the ancestral family. Many of these traditions record other designations as well, each of which carries with it the prerogative of performing a type of dance known as sacred. These will be spoken of, henceforth, as sacred names. The Bella Coola do not know the meaning of this term. These names, like ancestral name, are the potential property of members of the ancestral family, but can only be assumed when duly validated by presents. Such an assumption follows a period of seclusion in the back room of the house. Both men and women are eligible. A person may be secluded in this way a number of times, acquiring a new sacred name on each occasion, but as presents must be distributed every time, it follows that only the children or relatives of wealthy chiefs can be so favoured. It is desirable to have the bestowal of a sacred name occur at a potlatch, since guests from foreign tribes are then without special phrase, X calls upon some eloquent friend to direct the distribution of the money. This speaker states how X is carrying out the rites incumbent on his noble and exalted station, how all honour him for so doing, and how all should strive to follow his example. He then says that to give strength to the name Sisqumaxlis, for example, X will give away, say $100. He further announces who have contributed this amount: perhaps $50 from X, and the other half from various relatives of Y. If the sum in question be large it is always mentioned from whom, and how the donor has obtained the money. Thus every financial transaction becomes publicly known, and the more prominently a man figures, the greater is his prestige. Now, the amount to be used for the second initiate's name is announced, with the same details, and in distribution the same decided upon for each successive initiate.

Thus the total amount is distributed among the guests by the heralds, under X's supervision. He usually gives everyone the same amount; men sometimes receive more than women, but in every case members of the same sex receive an equal sum. The Bella Coola are not expert mathematicians, so that lengthy division is the rule. If X, for example, decides to give $1.50 to each person present, it is a time of considerable anxiety while the stack of bills is being reduced, to watch whether or not there will be the same amount. If X finds out he is short he will hastily borrow some money, as it would be an insult to omit anyone. If the amount be too great, he will use the surplus in making presents to the more influential guests.

With the exception of this possible surplus, the money distributed is regarded as an outright present. "It has flowed away to make good the boys' name" is the Bella Coola expression. A child will remember how much he has received, and if he wishes to uphold or to increase his own dignity, he will make a point of returning at least an equivalent to X on some future occasion. But though in effect he may make return, such is never said to be the case. "The money has flowed away."

to a complicated figure such as a whale, and in that case an expert dancer among the guests is called upon to perform. It is announced that this is, "to make clear the road for the dead."

After such masked figure has disappeared, the sound of whistling from without grows gradually weaker, as the apparition returns whence it came. In silence almost X takes a copper* which he has had in readiness, breaks it across his knee,* and throws it either into the fire or down on the ground in the track that the figure has taken. Then the announcer calls out loudly:

"It is for his crest.* It has 'made bone for the dead.'* Then he continues, speaking for X and using the first person:

"My heart is glad at seeing my father.* At death he returned back on the path of my family's ancestors and donned our ancient crest. We now live in Nuxalk-a, whence he came to visit us and whither he has now gone back."

The significance of the throwing down of a copper is entirely unknown to the modern Bella Coola, although they still perform the ritual. In some vague way it is felt that "bone," which may imply stability, has been provided for the deceased. The act thus appears to the light of an offering to the dead, but this sentiment is not clearly appreciated by the participants in the rite, the present has been made for, rather than to, the one being mourned.

The copper, now valueless, is picked up by any chief and given to a poor man.

After a short interval a number of youths begin to distribute presents, provided by X, which have been placed in readiness. Gifts of equal value are given to all foreign male guests, while the women receive cows less valuable. These presents a man, ts'munsa, with the prerogative of enforcing obedience to river taboos. Ever since, the owner of this name, when it has been duly legalized, has had the right to perform this function. In some cases, such as carpenters and singers, the validation of a prerogative has not brought with it the necessary ability, so that the incumbent remains a properly ratified, but non-functioning, craftsman. No mechanical skill is required by a River Guardian, hence the owner of the name ts'munsa has always been able to perform his duties. 424 463 551 693 [793]

From time immemorial certain restrictions have been enforced concerning the river: No refuse may be thrown in, otherwise the olachen would remain in the ocean. For the same reason, women at certain periods are not allowed to bathe lest a speck of blood should blind the fish and prevent them from coming to roots. Occasionally an olachen with red eyes is caught; this is caused by some heedless woman. When the fish are running in the river, women are not allowed on the bank, nor to repair the nets. At high tide, it is forbidden to drive canoes or olachen nets. 784 825 226 [515] 841 [562]

The number of prohibitions increases during the critical period of the salmon run. Then no freshly hewn planks can be set about, and even a canoe which has just been completed must be kept for ten days before launching. No one whose husband or wife has died within the last year can embark at the village, but must proceed to a landing-place at the head of the fiord. Most important of all, refuse of salmon must be deposited in the woods; if thrown into the river, the fish would smell it and avoid the stream. Even accidents such as the upsetting of a canoe, or the spilling of olachen grease, are considered to be offences. [502] [765]

Disregard of any of these injunctions is displeasing to the salmon and it is the duty of the River Guardian to punish the offender, irrespective of his rank. In case of slight infringements, he beats the guilty person or throws him into the river. The guilty person usually scrambles out, but should he be swept away and drowned, no recompense can be claimed by 688 693 quit. Details of this prerogative were not obtainable, but it seems to follow the general type.

THE PROFESSION OF FIRST BERRY PICKER

All women can pick berries, but in every village there is at least one who has the prerogative of picking the first of every kind. The origin of this right is lost in dim antiquity, but, like all others, each first berry picker has a special professional name embodied in her ancestral myth which must be duly validated before she can function. One of these is Sîtowaxwâ-nimde·a, another is Ła'ya. Though normally reserved for women, one of these names is occasionally given to a male child, in which case it is said to have been hermaphroditical. No one would dare to pick berries until the legal picker has paraded up and down the sidewalk carrying on her back her picking basket decorated with a representation of the sun, an act which is believed to ripen the berries.

"Get ready to pick red elderberries [or whatever species is ripe] tomorrow," she keeps calling out.

The berries may then be picked by anyone. This is repeated for every variety. As far as could be learnt, there was no social mechanism to punish a woman who picked berries before the announcement of the official picker; obedience seems to have been so universal that infractions are said to have been unknown though formerly there may have been some penalty of which even the memory has disappeared.

THE PROFESSION OF WARRIOR

The profession of warrior is another prerogative handed down from the distant past and requiring validation before it can be used. As with other rights of this type, magical means are in many cases employed to make any young man brave and successful, but there are a number of warriors confirmed as such by the distribution of presents at the time of bestowal on them of professional names. At the present time, it is

(c) They govern Y's status in this world. When women quarrel, as they often do, the most common boast to shame a less wealthy rival is a reminder of the number of times the speaker was repurchased and the value of the goods used. 556 583 [578]

"I can sit down on fifteen canoes," or "I am carried by five slaves," says the angry woman, mentioning whatever goods were used for her repurchase.

(d) Finally, these goods serve a more definite purpose in obtaining for Y a name, or names, of which the value is directly proportionate to the expenditure, precisely as the importance of a chief's designation depends on the goods used to validate it. [553]

As with men's names, some women's appellations were given by Alpuxtáw to the first arrivals; others were created on this earth with regard to peculiar events, and still others are names which can be used either by men or women. Theoretically, the dignity of the first type of name is greater than either of the others, but in practice the importance of the owner depends on the number of times she has bought herself from her husband; the principles governing the rank of women are thus the same as those already described for men. The term yaxwil, applied to a woman who has many times rebought herself and so reached a position of eminence, is the feminine equivalent to xáthway. The creation of women's names in reference to personal characteristics or incidents connected with their married life is more common than similar creations for men. The ritual of the bestowal of a name on Y, here given, was omitted from the description of the potlatch in order to lessen the complexity of that ceremony. It will be remembered that on the afternoon of the second day of the potlatch Y's relatives appear outside X's house, carrying valuable presents. 551 556 583 [554] [562] 553 556 583

The announcer calls out that Y's father has come to give "food" to X and his relatives. By food, presents are meant, which are the return, with interest, of the gifts given by X's relatives on various occasions. The giver is announced, for other relatives than Y's father contribute, and to whom the

*556 969 messengers may be marked with the same ritual as at a potlatch, but there is always curtailment of most features if rites of that nature are to be omitted.

Meanwhile other preparations have not been neglected. 424 Among the prerogatives embodied in many origin myths, is *556 that of the presence of professional mourners at memorial 969 potlatches. If mention of these is made in the ancient tradi- tion of the donor's ancestral family, it is a matter of pride for [967] him to do as was done by his ancestors in the distant past. For example, it may be recorded that at the memorial potlatch of some ancient chief, a number of his younger relatives appeared with red paint smeared upon their faces, with finely chopped undyed cedar-bark in the hair, or with bands of the [965] same material across their heads. Alpaxiw had decreed that they should thus exhibit their grief, and the descendants of the chief have since had the privilege of doing likewise. Such signs of mourning may not, however, be worn without proper validation. It is only the members of the ancestral family who are entitled to don these marks, and among them, only those whose right has been confirmed by the distribution of presents. This is a masculine professional prerogative, known [962] by the same name as the feminine one of uttering a drawing cry to which it is closely akin. The right is ratified at memorial potlatches, and the donor of one is glad to do so as a means of displaying his own wealth as well as of making plain the glory of his ancestors to whom the one being commemorated has returned. There is no mention of professional mourners in [967] the myths of many families, nor are they ever as important in [17] Bella Coola as among the Bella Bella and other tribes of the outer coast. If such belong to the family of the donor, he notifies the incumbents and asks them to be ready, although, eager to act, they seldom wait for such an invitation.

533 The most difficult task is the preparation of mourning songs *556 at which the singers toil for several weeks. The donor first 969 invites them to his house and recounts the myths from which they must be composed. These may include several traditions phases of activity, leaving here only certain rules about diet and a number of prohibitions which hunters must observe.

FOOD TABOOS OBSERVED BY WOMEN

Women must not eat bear meat. To do so would derange the catamenia and cause profuse growth of hair.

Women of child-bearing age must not eat beaver. To do so would cause a difficult delivery.

A woman of child-bearing age must not eat roasted salmon until the sticks have been removed which hold it in front of the fire. She will bear twins if this injunction is disregarded.

TABOOS OBSERVED BY HUNTERS

No hunter or fisherman may leave the village in the morning if he has been foolish enough to break the night's fast. It is customary to depart at dawn and take a small meal when nearing the hunting or fishing-ground.

No hunter may drink water in which dog salmon have been soaked. Animals dislike this liquid and avoid a man with it in his stomach.

When traps have been set, and a party of hunters is sitting around the camp-fire in the evening, no one must pass between it and one of his fellows. If this should be done, heedlessly, animals would disregard the bait that has been set out.

When mountain goat hunters are travelling, the most expert must lead the party. When he sits down, so must the others, and no one can change places with him. This is said to be a custom of the Carriers as well as of the Bella Coola.

When a hunter is cutting up a bear, he must be careful not to cut a vein which is said to run across the chest and down each fore-paw. To do so causes sickness.

When a hunter kills a bear, he must place either the skull or the whole head into tree near the scene of the kill, otherwise he will become blind. In some families, the man removes only an eye, places it in a notched stick and set this under an over-

since each fisherman provided one when his box was filled. 226

No one is allowed to drink water immediately after eating the first olachen of the spring, since to do so would cause a flood. It is considered most improper for a child to cry soon after partaking of this food; if he does so, he is quieted by having nettles stuffed into his mouth. As already described, if a person dies before the first fish have passed through his bowels, a shaman must wipe his lips with cedar-bark. 796 574 [865]

After the first meal of olachen, rakes for the nets can be driven, and the restrictions become less exacting. Women are not allowed to assist in fishing, but the men devote their full time to the task, working with zest and energy.[1] An abundant supply of olachen is a source of joy, and all listen eagerly for the singing of the thrush, cmcmcmcmcmcm, which signifies that the nets are full to bursting. Half jocularly, people invite the bird to come and eat, but his melody is interpreted as: 226 [562] [825]

"I shall eat when the river is full."

RITES CONNECTED WITH THE FIRST SPRING SALMON[2]

Salmon is the most important article of Bella Coola diet and the rites which accompany the earliest taking of the fish are relatively complicated. 226 796 [262]

When the first spring salmon have been caught, they are laid in the canoe with their heads all pointing eastward, upstream. The fisherman paddles to shore, but instead of landing his catch, he throws the salmon to a stake driven at the edge of the bank so that they remain in the water. A number of posts are usually placed in readiness, each decorated with alternate spirals of dyed and undyed cedar-bark and crowned with an eagle's tail. Each day one or two more fish may be caught, but all are left in the water until the first have become soft, thus giving sufficient time for the necessary preparations on shore. It is the duty of every owner of a salmon-weir to build near its end a so-called Spring Salmon House, a shed-like [343]

women listening from the village are able to tell how many have been caught from the number of times the cry xaĺ'loi is raised. 226 796

Then the salmon are cut up (only shell knives may be used for the purpose) and cooked. Everything must be used, heads, bones, and entrails, the only refuse being the blood which is scraped from the leaves and carried into the woods. The leaves themselves, and the strings of dyed and undyed cedar-bark are thrown into the river in accordance with a desire expressed by Naĺkymm long ago. When everything is ready for a meal, the men take their places in two rows, facing each other across a coarse bark mat. Bark spoons have been provided, and when the heralds call for food, the fisherman brings the heads of the salmon and the guests make the motions of eating, though in reality these parts are dried and kept for winter. Boxes containing a liberal portion of the choice meat are next served and all eat freely. Each guest puts on one side what he has not consumed as if to carry it away, as is the custom at an ordinary feast, though his share is really left in the shelter until the following day. Finally, a third course is provided, the back of the fish cooked with the bone in position. Like the last, the guests eat as much as they desire and pack up the residue as if to take away. Then they leave the Spring Salmon House. [412] 226 796 574 [251]

All the fish are not cooked on the one occasion. The following day the fisherman again calls back the men of his village. The same type of meal is served, but this time the guests carry away what they do not eat for the benefit of their families. This portion may be eaten by the women without offending the salmon. [562]

This rite has not been performed in full detail in Bella Coola for many years, and it was impossible to collect information on some points. It is uncertain, for example, whether this ceremony was carried out by every fisherman or whether there used to be certain individuals with the prerogative of dealing with the first catch. The latter appears to be the most logical 226 796 424

1:34cIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948

manner, and was definitely stated to be the case by one well-informed old man. It is clear, however, that every spring salmon was landed with the cry of xal'lai, taken to the Spring Salmon House, and cut up by the men until the time when women were allowed near the river. Another old man stated that the feast took place at night and that only the heads and refuse of the first catch were eaten, the remainder being dried for the winter. Women of child-bearing age were not allowed on the river bank, and were rigorously excluded from the Spring Salmon House until the time when the sun's shadow reached a diagonal scar on the slope of one of the mountains on the north side of North Bentinck Arm. This occurs about August. From that time onwards, there was no calling of xal'lai, and women, except those who were taboo, could cut salmon freely on the bank. It was even stated that refuse of salmon could be thrown into the river after that time. No one knows the origin of this seasonal prohibition, or why it should end when the sun reaches a certain point, but it was faithfully observed in former times.

In Kimsquit similar rites were carried out, the chief variation being that the bodies of four swans were placed in the Spring Salmon House and the fish laid with these at intervals in the line. Moreover, the youth used to bite the back of each salmon so he presented it with the cedar-bark streamer. The same regulations with regard to drinking water, and crying after eating, were enforced for spring salmon as for eulachon.

Miscellaneous Beliefs

The following miscellaneous beliefs and customs cannot be assigned to any special aspect of Bella Coola life:

If a spark from a fire jumps out and lights on a person's head, it is said:

"The fire wants to give you [the person on whom the brand has fallen] food."

If a man sneezes repeatedly, it is said:

[533] Most kwiat songs are in five parts, which may be described as three verses, separated by two choruses. Near the beginning of the first verse X stands up, raises his arms, shakes his fingers, then slightly bends his legs and begins to step in time to the beating of the sticks. Some dancers remain almost stationary, marking time, to use the military term, others advance in steps of an inch or so, at intervals slowly revolving sunwise.[*] Sometimes X introduces a variation by bending from side to side, in which case one hand rises above the other. If the time of the song is very slow, he sinks, bending his knees to a great extent, and advances in more lengthy strides, never ceasing to shake his hands. At each chorus the time becomes so rapid that it is impossible to move the feet in accordance with it, and then X crouches, his shaking hands the only movement. If it [424] is a woman who is dancing—like most kwiat prerogatives, this [52] one is not limited to men—the style of dancing is quite different. Keeping the upper part of each arm close to her body, the dancer extends her fore-arms, outwards, parallel to the ground, with the palms upwards. Like a man, she shakes her wrists, but few female dancers move from the spot on which they start, except perhaps to turn around, sunwise. Hereldz always keep up a running fire of comments, especially when a woman is dancing, urging her not to be bashful, but to allow her breasts to shake. Some dancers have merged into one [424] prerogative rights acquired from different coastal tribes. In such cases they perform in two or more styles, each part according to one prerogative.

Kukwilat are always ready to assist one of their fellows, so that three or four friends are always willing to accompany the dancer. They stand close behind him, at frequent intervals blowing over his head the eagle down which either X, or some

This ejaculation is supposed to make the work of manufacture less difficult. The same procedure is repeated with every mask ordered, except that if the being to be represented is a woman, X's ejaculation is i ....., Any Indian can make a mask, but the preference is always given to a man who has shown ability in previous tasks. The carpenters endeavour to follow well-recognized designs for many representations, but a great deal of latitude is allowed, and a workman receives greater praise and fame for turning out a fine and distinctive piece of new design, than for rigid adherence to a former type. This, combined with the burning of masks and consequent loss of permanent patterns, is responsible for the variability in Bella Coola forms, and the difficulty which they themselves experience in recognizing portrayed beings.

As soon as all the carpentry has been allotted, the singers strike up one of X's eight songs. Whether or not he dances to them is a matter about which there is a difference of opinion among informants. In any case the re-singing on recitatives is purely for rehearsal, made necessary by the large number of songs. Later on in the Indian season, the songs of other dancers may be practised on this night, and if the owners wish to practise their steps, it is quite proper for them to do so. Finally, a meal is distributed, while the recitatives dancers in the usual way. Fruits are features of all Indian dances, and the food distributed is regarded as a free-will gift, without thought of repayment. After eating, the Indian dancers, X must sleep within his own house, but no longer remains within his plankers-enclosure.

The next day, the twenty-sixth of the ceremony, is quiet. Early in the morning a herald summons to X's house, where the blocks have been left, all those to whom work has been assigned. All morning they carve diligently. The speed with which masks are completed is surprising, although this has undoubtedly increased since the introduction of metal tools. In the middle of the day a few Indian men, no women, are invited to show "the carpenters' meal," as the food provided by X is called. Having dined, the guests depart while the craftsmen continue their labours. Towards dusk the house is cleared up, the chips thrown on the fire and everything made ready. On this night the uninitiated are invited, but there is a wide and important difference in ritual between Bella Coola and Kitsaquit. In the former the masks are carefully concealed, whereas in Kitsaquit one or two, or sometimes all, are suspended behind the fire by the carpenters. It is accordingly difficult for an observer to understand why this practice does not at once remove all secrecy from the rite. The explanation appears to lie in the fact that the uninitiated, ignorant of how they have been made, see in these strange objects evidence of the power of the dancers. In Kitsaquit, moreover, members of the society emphasize the fact that the dancers are supernaturally endowed representations of what the beings above are doing and performing, and it is only at certain rites that they are actually supposed to be present. One old Bella Coola remembered having heard from his grandfather that long before his time the carpenters used to make the masks in their own houses where the uninitiated could see them; the dancer would come in, wave his arm over the craftsman's head and cry hoi! if the workmanship was excellent. The man who described this expressed his own scepticism, and added that it would have destroyed the key-note of secrecy. A possible explanation of this important difference in ritual will be given at the end of this chapter; for the present it will be enough to point out that the masks are left suspended in Kitsaquit, and concealed in Bella Coola.

Towards dusk the herald goes to every house to summon the dancers, who have adorned themselves for the ceremony by washing and painting, as the uninitiated have also done. The members assemble slowly, in fact an observer finds the interminable delays of every dancer more provoking. At last all have appeared and taken their places around the fire, while the uninitiated eagerly wait near the door for the instructions which they know will soon be given. One of the men-

X remains concealed on the platform, supposedly without eating, for four days. On the fourth day occurs the ceremony of washing. Early in the morning a herald goes to every house in the village asking for urine and grease extracted from the heads of sockeye salmon. The kukwiat gather in X's house, to which full chamber-vessels and pots of grease have been taken. No uninitiated are allowed to be present, but from adjacent houses they hear sounds of furious struggling, combined with growling. Presently they see a number of kukwiat carrying X, smeared with liquid, to the river. Some informants state that he is actually covered with urine and fish-oil, others that these are merely emptied within the house and water poured over X, that their collection is merely to deceive the uninitiated. At any rate he is taken to the river, where, in spite of his shrieks, kicks, and struggles, he is four times dressed by his guardians. Often he seizes stones from the bed of the stream and hurls them at his captors, sometimes bruising them severely. This washing assists in the restoration of X to sanity. He is taken four times to every house in the village, no longer growling and struggling, and a herald announces that he will dance that evening.

Soon after dusk the kukwiat are summoned and they practise the four songs composed for X. Then the uninitiated are called in. As his songs are sung, X dances in the usual kwakiutl style, but more violently than usual, and growling at intervals. The women drone and his four guardians stand close by, spitting into his ears to soothe him.* This is done by calling hoip loudly close to his head, so that a spray of fine saliva is ejected over him. After dancing, X sits down once more and a marshal calls out that food is to be given to him; he is supposed to have eaten nothing but morsels of human flesh since his departure for the upper world. The women are sent [542] away since no female can witness a Cannibal's first meal. Three kakaciut are dispatched to ask for food, as if they were begging on behalf of X. Olachen grease, dried salmon, dried meat, and other luxuries are always given to them, and the uninitiated women are excited at witnessing this collection of food. Sometimes a request is made during the day, and the messengers are entitled to call upon any individual by name to provide grease or some other delicacy.

The actual feeding is done by a shaman who is also a kaciut. He first dips his hands in the grease, warms them at the fire and rubs them over X's face as the struggling Cannibal is held by six or eight kakaciut. Members of the society keep calling out hoip to soothe X, who is supposed to be like a wild animal, and to have lost all desire for ordinary food. Like a maniac he snaps at the shaman's fingers, while the kakaciut cry out and the uninitiated watch with fear and amazement. After rubbing the Cannibal's cheeks four times, the shaman shouts out that he is almost ready to eat. The heralds echo his words, and go through the village to inform all of what has taken place. The shaman now puts a few morsels of food in a spoon and tries to feed X, who struggles and tries to bite pieces out of the wooden staff. Undiscouraged, he puts small pieces of food actually into X's mouth, headlong of the snapping jaws, and at last persuades him to swallow a little.

"He has eaten," the shaman calls out joyfully, and the heralds repeat the good tidings.

An effort is next made to force him to drink, but X only bites the vessel, and the fingers of the shaman, and succeeds in drenching himself with the liquid. But at last he swallows a few mouthfuls.

"He has drunk," calls the shaman, and as before the heralds repeat his words.

The shaman now tells the uninitiated that X will be all right, but that it will be safer for them to depart, as they leave willingly. Heralds keep everyone in the village informed of the events.

in a flesh-coloured bathing-suit, imitating the nakedness of earlier years. The writer was talking to one of the marshals, a very old man, and remarked how different the present rites must appear to him.

"Yes," replied the old man. "But after all, the change is not so great. In former years we imitated what the supernatural beings did, now we imitate what our fathers did."

Many ethnologists, acquainted with the elaborate rituals carried out on the coast early in this century, have expressed surprise at the rapidity with which these have dwindled to mere shadows. The writer believes that one factor for the Bella Coola decline in ritual, is the realization that the rites are imitative, and that accordingly their significance could not be lost when further imitation is added.

Further research would undoubtedly have added particulars of the manner in which other Cannibals carried out their rites, but to obtain the full details of all would have been detrimental to other types of investigation; it is believed that the above descriptions are typical. Before passing to other dances, a few general remarks on the Cannibal ritual may prove useful.

In view of the arduous character of the dance, and the necessity for impressing the uninitiated with the great power of the Cannibals, the marshals usually prohibit a man from acting unless he is physically strong. Rarely, however, a woman is allowed to be a Cannibal if she has the necessary prerogative, but usually only if she is the last survivor of her family. In such cases the shorter rite is the more common.

As before stated, Bacchic origin myths are supposed to be remembered, but in practice few Bacchic know the history of their prerogatives. The process of forgetting has undoubtedly increased in the last few years, but the writer feels confident that they were never maintained with the same care as origin myths connected with the Circle people.

[The Ghost Dance]

X's, where he is soothed by the four times repeated frenzied beating of sticks and his call returned whence it came.

During the rest of the ceremonial season X becomes mad at intervals and displays his insanity by rushing to every house and throwing dirt and sand. His kulaxiar escort is always with him, and the procedure is identical with that already recorded. X makes no recompense for the damage inflicted, so it is probable that his fellows do not regard his dance as an unmitigated pleasure, but nothing can be done to deter him from exercising his prerogative.

Although the Bella Coola are probably as moral as members of any other tribe, they enjoy humour of an obscene nature, and a dance which never fails to provide amusement is that of the Supernatural Charmer. The patron of this is Sainxcoimuk, a beautiful, unmarried, feminine being who is also termed Mlqmaks and Nuxkmalaxis. She is thought to disregard the efforts of her supernatural relatives to restrain her, and comes to this earth where she bestows her favours not only on human beings, but on animals. Her prestige at Kimsquit is a young man, Xalaxalc, at Bella Coola, a young woman, Kwalkwac; like all other kuxiar names these can be used either by men or women. It is said that Xalaxalc's prerogative is derived from the experience of an ancestor in past ages, whereas that of Kwalkwac was initiated three generations ago by a very powerful child. The ritual in each case is identical, so the dancer can be referred to as X. Each has the prerogative of singing not only of Sainxcoimuk, but also of the being known as Wunsinamuk. Many masks are required at the nakwam of either of these beings, so it is customary for X to perform with respect to Sainxcoimuk one year, and to Wunsinamuk at the next or a subsequent ceremonial season, though the actual songs always refer to both persons.

When X wishes to dance he consults the marshals, obtains their consent, and then makes final arrangements on, normally,

cases though an infant in arms, though uninitiated, can be brought to dances by its mother; distinctions between rich and poor, slave and freeman, become of slight importance; all that really matters is whether a person is or is not a kuxiut. Membership in the society seems to the uninitiated the most desirable thing in life, although their fears are always so strong that they never cease to dread actual admission. The feeling of class consciousness which exists in a somewhat mild form at other seasons of the year, gives place to a powerful sentiment of superiority on the part of members of the society over those who are not so fortunate. Even the respect normally shown to chiefs is submerged since they, too, are subject to the rule of the marshals.

575* 796* 182 571 [781]

Apart entirely from this attitude of superiority and inferiority, is the bond of fellowship engendered among members of the society by the rites. Whatever happens, the uninitiated must be deceived. Moreover, the psychological effect of gathering nightly in a body for a specific purpose is tremendous. Night after night they eat together; night after night they listen to the words of the marshals, who impress on them the need for co-operation and secrecy, who hold before them the good example set by their fellows who have carried out rites successfully, who emphasize the fact that they are doing as their fathers did. The ceremonial import is of greatest consequence at all these gatherings, but when the uninitiated have withdrawn the kuxiut relax somewhat and enjoy themselves. The food itself is always of the best and some of the usual restrictions are removed. It is, for example, the only time that women are allowed to eat the flesh of seals. If this delicacy is provided the marshals enjoy the tidbits, but after Cannibals, novices, and others have received preferential treatment, the remainder is distributed to all and sundry.

It has been stated by some writers, especially those unfamiliar with the significance of native ceremonial life, that the dances of the coastal tribes are orgies of immorality. This point was investigated with care and it may be stated posi-

opened out on to a wooden platform, which served as sidewalk and extended from one end of the settlement to the other. The outer side of this structure was always supported on piles; in fact, in many cases, the houses as well as the whole sidewalk were thus raised from the ground. This type of construction was necessitated by the sloping sites of the villages, but had the added advantage of being a protection against attack. The villages differed in size from insignificant settlements of three to four houses, to ones with twenty or thirty, each containing several families. The ease with which the red cedar could be split and worked into large planks made possible the construction of these large, rectangular houses which, with their horizontally laid walls and sloping roofs, presented a picture of stability and relative comfort superior to that of most Indian habitations.

Each village was practically an independent political unit. Neighbouring settlements had many common interests which drew them into contact with one another, but there was no organized cohesion between the towns of the Bella Coola valley, or between those of Tal'ts and Kimsquit. There was still less to draw these three groups together. There was no supreme chief and no governmental meeting of the tribe as a whole. Not only were the three divisions not bound to support one another in war, they were often at loggerheads among themselves. Indeed, bloodshed between towns of the Bella Coola valley itself was not uncommon. Moreover, each group tended to merge with its neighbours. The Tal'ts people frequently married with the Rivers Inlet and the Bella Bella; the Kimsquit with the ostmay[*] of Dean Channel and the Kitlala of Gardner Canal; and the Bella Coola of the upper valley with the Carriers.

In spite of these inconsistencies, the application of the word tribe is justifiable for the following reasons:

A. Language. All spoke the same language. There were dialectical differences among the people of Bella Coola, Tal'ts, and Kimsquit, but each group could understand the tribes. This differentiated them clearly from all neighbouring tribes.

[*] As would commonly speaking, capital + has not been used.

B. Ceremonies. A member of a secret society in any of the above towns was accepted as a member in any other one. A person of another tribe, even if known to belong to a comparable society, was treated as an uninitiated person.

C. Omens and Reasons. The people of Bella Coola, Tl'ai'o, and Kimsquit felt themselves to be akin through acceptance of the fact that their ancestors had been created together in the beginning of time. This marked them off with great clearness from all other tribes, especially from the Carriers of the interior. This belief formed a sentimental and religious bond of great strength.

Neighbouring Tribes

It is desirable to describe, briefly, the tribes with which the Bella Coola came in contact.

The Carriers

East of Bella Coola, amid the mountains of the interior, dwell the Carriers. In summer they often came down to the river valley to fish or trade for salmon, and in winter they were sometimes forced by cold and starvation again to visit the Bella Coola, Bella Bella, or Rivers Inlet people. There was a good deal of intermarriage between them and the inhabitants of the upper valley, so that the wanderers were able to spend the cold months with relatives. Since the ban, the Bella Coola considered these people utterly foreign in habits and beliefs, and to call a man a "Carrier" was, and still is, a deadly insult. The Carriers lacked the rich commercial life of the coastal peoples who, therefore, supplied them with arrows and canoes. The presence of a few of the much-despised Carriers was, however, almost necessary to the correct performance of the winter dances since they were uninitiated spectators whom it was necessary to impress and delude.

THE BULLA BULLA

West of Bulla Coola lived the Bulla Bulla, known as Ojindikwey. Although linguistic differences prevented free exchange of ideas, and active hostility was not unknown, there was considerable intermarriage between the two tribes. The Bulla Coola recognized the similarity of culture between them; in fact, whereas a Captor was despised for lack of knowledge of ceremonial and domestic duetons, a Bulla Bulla was respected for his superior lore in that respect. The Bulla Coola believe that many of their clan have been obtained from them.

The chief Bulla Bulla villages are said to have been: Ymahm, on "Kwawa" Bay; Ilil'ma, on "Dlama"; Qoiyai, four miles from the last-mentioned; Yiahm.

At Ymahm, the nearest settlement, so many of the people spoke Bulla Coola that it was practically bilingual. There had been so many intermarriages for generations that the people were not considered foreigners. In fact, Boas includes it among Bulla Coola villages (p. 48). There were seven villages on Kwawa Inlet and the Kwawa River which flows in from the south-east.

(c) Ymahkamil, "Where It Spoke": a small outpost on the eastern shore of Kwawa Inlet near the entrance. There may once have been a permanent settlement on the site, but for many years it was used only as a look-out station when raiders were expected.

It is said that on one occasion, long long ago, a party of Kwawa people was encamped at this spot, waiting for enemy raiders whose approach had been reported. They did not appear when expected and one of the members, wearied by the long wait, said to the guards (agents of one of the hostile companions who had accepted him):

"Tell us when is going to happen."

"You will all be killed to-morrow," answered a rumbling voice from the engine, to the great consternation of everybody.

So it transpired. The hostile raiders surprised the outlaws the next day and only one escaped to tell the tale.

The place has since been known as, "Where It Spoke." It was long ago deserted.

THE ceiney[a]

Before the smallpox epidemic, about 1885, there were towns on the fords and villages of Deen Channel between Kinnapit and Bulla Bulla. The inhabitants were called ceiney by the Bulla Coola, and ceeiy by the Bulla Bulla. Their settlements were at Elder Harbour, Green River, Cascade Inlet, and at several unidentified places. Their language is said to have differed slightly from that of the Bulla Bulla, but the people themselves mixed freely with both Kinnapit and Bulla Bulla, thus forming a connecting link between these tribes.

A list of ceiney towns was obtained from one old man, who claimed to be a descendant of the people. It was impossible to verify this information, and since he himself was not an ideal informant, the following can be regarded only as approximately correct.

(1) Ilkw on Elder Harbour.

(2) Kilk-i on a ford one mile above the last-named.

(3) Ilkkl or Tsqiw-i on a river three miles above the preceding.

(4) Tsemsit-ai on a river two miles above the preceding.

(5) Tsequil on a ford three miles above the preceding.

(6) Tsulkw on a ford three miles above the preceding.

(7) Tsemsilk on a river two miles above the last-named and thirty miles below Kinnapit.

According to the old man from whom the above list was obtained, Tsemsilk, or Kinnapit, occupied earlier as village no. 1[1], was also populated by ceiney people. There was so much intermarriage between the two groups that it is now impossible to ascertain whether the inhabitants not only of Tsemsilk, but of Tsemsit-ai and, perhaps, Tsequil, were predominantly Kinnapit or ceiney.

The open glacier in which the Bulla Coola River rises has always made travel possible for long distances, as there are only is a more obvious social grouping than the ancestral family, though it is of the latter that a man is most proud. The member of a small, unimportant village often describes himself as a native of a neighboring, larger one where at a distance from his home, simply as a matter of convenience.

Even before the coming of the white man, village sites were abandoned and people took up their residence with friends or relatives elsewhere. In fact, mythology contains instances of such migrations at the very beginning of time. In case of this kind, memory of the earlier home has been preserved for many generations, and may perhaps be the explanation of the many villages which are described as two, and which have two names. In the early days immigrants seem always to have been welcomed, they added to the numerical strength of the village, and the original inhabitants enjoyed boasting to the newcomers of their descent from the first settlers. Since any group forced to abandon their own homes naturally moved to those of relatives, there is no difficulty in understanding the process by which they continued to intermarry with their new neighbors. Thus two, or even more ancestral families, inhabiting one village tended to form a closely inter-related stock. In rare instances, two unrelated ancestral families may have become inhabitants of the same village, which would unquestionably lead to intermarriage.

In most cases the endogamic tendencies already described mean the village community to be largely members of one ancestral family. In addition there are always other residents, strangers who have fled from their homes and sought refuge among the Bella Coola; the offspring of illicit intercourse with slaves; guests; foreigners, especially Carriers temporarily resident in Bella Coola; and finally slaves, without status in the community. The real inhabitants, those whose power is firmly planted in the village, are the reputed descendants of the first group of settlers, and accordingly a relative coming to live in a village usually endeavors to obtain a name from the origin myth of the ancestral family occupying it, and thus with a number of the large cone-shaped whistles used for nawi ceremonial. Towards dawn, sounds come from them, and sometimes a dull thump is heard on the roof, as if a heavy being had landed there. At once there is great excitement within the house. The voices of supernatural people prove them to be at hand. No one is allowed to leave except a nawi ahi[17] who is skilled in dealing with Mulishla,[18] also called Sisiqhenem, the supernatural being closely connected with the nawi ritual. Those within can hear the voice of the ahi raised as if he were speaking to someone at a distance.

"Chief, you have come too early," he says. "The house is not yet ready. Please return later."

He is answered by loud whistling, which grows fainter, as if the being who made it were moving away. In reality the young men are merely blowing less forcibly into the whistles.

[17] The accounts of all informants agree that much of the nawi ritual was merely imported into Bella Coola from Bella Bella. According to some statements, Pielas, a Bella Coola chief who died between 1870 and 1880, married a Bella Bella wife, who was from Rivers Inlet, and it was these two women who brought with them to their village the nawi ceremony. It is said that previous to this time the Bella Coola did not understand the use of the large cone-shaped whistles, nor were they able to summon the supernatural beings to the profile painted in the back-room, nor to depict the beings on the conclusion of the rites. On the other hand, some Bella Coola claim that their two ancestors brought the whistles with them from the land above. It is probable that the calling in of the supernatural beings is a recent addition to the prelude, which accounts for the contradictory statements, but whether or not the whistles are a new feature is more doubtful. It appears certain that the prerogative of ahi has recently been obtained from the Bella Bella. Ahi means "the one who cures," and the name is given to the man whose prerogative it is to treat the doctor initiates to whom supernatural powers are bestowed. In Bella Bella there is a similar functionary for Kaiai nurses, known as a kai ahi[illegible]. Though nawi-marriage-owned Bella Coola have recently obtained this prerogative, in such case it is frankly stated that it has been derived from the Bella Bella. The Bella Coola apply to them, as formerly, the term ahi, as they do for the doctor "nawi," though the Bella Bella nawi, but ahi[illegible], is used with equal frequency. The present ahi have endeavoured to claim for themselves certain ceremonial functions formerly carried out by nawi-men. In this account of a prelude it is assumed that a ahi is functioning on all occasions, but in many cases nawi-men could be considered sufficiently close to the supernatural beings to act satisfactorily. Until about 1870 it is clear that any nawi-man was regarded as capable of doing so.

[18] Knowledge of this being is said to have been acquired by the marriage of a certain chiefess of Kimsquit to a Bella Bella woman in the beginning of time.

585 "sewing" or "rope fastening" for her. Within a few days or weeks, they must invite their fellow-villagers to a community of some kind. If it is winter this can be a social dance, but in summer it must be a non-sacred affair. Y's father and other relatives attend, furnished with the usual gifts. When the ceremony is over and the time has come for the distribution of presents, a herald calls out that X has no seat. If he has already been established in one he calls out that it is not free." Y at once brings forward some of the goods provided by her relatives, and places them with the goods which X's family received at the wedding and are about to give away. The whole is then divided among the guests, together with presents provided by X for Y's relatives. The actual purpose of the rite may be to obtain names for some of X's young relatives or to establish seats for them; it is immaterial to Y's people to what end they are applied. Within recent years this has sometimes taken place at a Sacred dance, but such overlapping between the two types of ceremonial is probably an innovation due to decay.

1177 585 Since 1900 an effort was made to introduce a marriage custom of the Kwakiutl. According to the Bella Coola, among them the wife given to her husband's relatives one or more boards studded with teeth of the sea-otter. This makes teeth for the bride, so that if she ever quarrels with another woman she can draw back her lips and shame her rival by saying:

"What can you do? You have no teeth, while I have two sets," or as many boards as have been given at her marriage.

[583] The grandson of a Fort Rupert Kwakiutl, living in Bella Coola and considered a member of the tribe, owned one of these boards and used it at the marriage of his daughter in 1919. It was first given to the mother of the bridegroom, and superimposed with a copper; then given to the bridegroom, and subsequently finally given, and again superimposed, from the father of the groom. One of the people who came to the earth in the beginning of time, Tsuishmale by name, travelled to the Skeena River, and there saw women wearing labrets. On his return to Bella Coola he settled at Bentzipu and carved on his totem-pole[2] the figure of a woman with an abalone-shell labret as a memorial of his voyage. Visitors coming to his potlatches named the town from this figure.

[177] [178] This myth is fervently believed by the Bella Coola. Even Christian Indians, though they readily admit the biblical creation as applied to the white race, remain convinced of the manner in which their own ancestors came into being. At the present time, though most ancient beliefs are rapidly passing away, few, if any, Bella Coola doubt this account of the creation of their forefathers. Their conviction rests not only on the religious aspect of their life, but on the sociological. A man's most treasured possessions are the name brought down from above by his ancestor in the beginning of time, the knowledge of the form taken by that ancestor, and information about the place where he landed. A collection of myths of this kind is given in vol. I, chap. vi. Lacking knowledge of his first ancestor's form, a Bella Coola has slight chance of becoming a chief; such law is the birthright of every descendant of one of these first people, and those without it are almost certain to be the offspring of slaves. The social aspects of creation myths will be described later; at this point a broad outline must suffice. Nuxalk-a, "The House of Myths," is the place in which these myths were made, and are now stored, two reasons for its importance in the eyes of the Bella Coola.

[179] Nuxalk-a is not only concerned with the history of an indi-

is no doubt that a man tends to lose those rights in property which are strictly his, if they are located at a distance. Thus several men claim that they are legally entitled to hunt at Kitlaha, but from mere difficulty of access neither they nor their fathers have exercised the right, and it would have been lost in the course of a few generations, even without the over-decay of custom which has followed the advent of the white man. Practically, a man hunts only in the grounds of those ancestral families to whose origin myths he has access, though, theoretically, he is entitled to hunt on any hunting-ground of any ancestral family of which he is a member whether or not he holds a duly validated name from its origin myth. It is not necessary to confirm the right to property as with a name, though a validated ancestral name is the usual mark of a man's right to that area of the ancestral family to which that designation belongs. Although the ownership of land in distant regions is of little practical importance, it is, none the less, a matter of great pride to a man to feel that he has rights in many places. The efforts of an individual to make good these claims has often led to bloodshed; in fact, one intelligent old man stated that property disputes were the principal cause for war in British Columbia. A person who lacks hunting-grounds is little better than a slave, whereas one who has much land is important.

The Bella Coola regard land as almost inalienable. Though a man does not own the land of his wife's ancestral family, he can use it and his children have full rights to it. Conversely, a wife can gather berries on her husband's land, though it is not hers. A guest or a village may be allowed to use the territory of his hosts, but it does not become his. In the old days wars between the central tribes were common, but though slaves were taken freely, land was never seized; such is unthinkable to a Bella Coola. In fact, several of the older people inquired how it had been possible, in the free world war, for the allies, whose cause they believed to be righteous, to assume territory from Germany. If the victors had killed or enslaved [illegible] is a more obvious social grouping than the ancestral family, though it is of the latter that a man is most proud. The member of a small, unimportant village often identifies himself as a native of a neighbouring, larger one when at a distance from his home, simply as a matter of convenience.

In fact, mythology contains instances of such migrations at the very beginning of time. In cases of this kind, memory of the earlier home has been preserved for many generations, and may perhaps be the explanation of the many villages which are described as two, and which have two names. In the early days immigrants were always to have been welcome; they added to the numerical strength of the village, and the original inhabitants enjoyed boasting to the newcomers of their descent from the first settlers. Coast social organization, and of the absence of constitutional obligations based upon specific relationships.

Slaves

Since a slave was[a] without status in the Bella Coola community, it is perhaps incorrect to include a description of slavery in a chapter on social organization; but as slaves lived in the Bella Coola villages, it seems reasonable to include them when dealing with the different units of the tribe. It was impossible to obtain an accurate estimate of their number in Bella Coola; slavery has been so long abandoned that the present natives could only hazard vague guesses. Judging from conversational remarks by elderly men, it seems probable that in the old days there was a considerable slave population in every Bella Coola village, comprising at times as much as thirty to forty per cent of the total population.

When a party raided a village most of the inhabitants were slain, but some, especially children, young adults, or famous chiefs were captured. So far as could be learned, once a captive had reached Bella Coola he was in little danger, slave torture or ignominious slaying after the heat of battle had subsided was not a Bella Coola characteristic. The leader of the expedition retained many of the captives as his own slaves, and distributed others among his followers. Anyone, chief or commoner, could own slaves in the same way that he could own any other type of goods.

Like any other commodities, slaves were bought and sold. The Bella Coola were usually as well provided with salmon that they were able to exchange them fish with the members of other tribes for slaves. Lack of strong clanfriendship among the Bella Coola hindered their success in war, so that most of their slaves were obtained by trade. To the same category belong those obtained as prisoners or pedlarlike. If however, a member of one of the tribes on the lower Fraser River was given as a slave to a Bulu Cocle, he was treated as a guest. Slaves were borrowed between Bulu Cocle individuals as a matter of course. Their value depended on sex, ability, and industriousness, as well as on supply and demand. When there was an over-supply, the value of a slave fell to twenty or thirty cubiens, but whenever an owner found that someone wished to purchase a particular slave he endeavoured to raise the price. If a foreigner borrowed goods in Bulu Cocle he usually had someone a relative as pledge. Thus, not many years ago, a Kamsi Indian, from near Green Lake, borrowed goods from a Kiwanguale man and left his son as pledge. The goods were not returned, so the son was sold as a slave to the people of Kiwanu.

It was not uncommon for a Bulu Cocle to lose his freedom by gambling. In this connection, a player who had exhausted his goods was subsequently wagered his children, or in extreme cases, himself. If he lost, his children, or himself, became the property of the winner. Unless specially repurchased by some relative, such slaves were usually sold or given away at the first opportunity to a member of a foreign tribe, since it was considered improper for a man to hold a member of his own tribe in servitude. The same course of action was taken with those men captives whom our Bulu Cocle village fought against; his neighbors and prisoners were taken.

To the Bulu Cocle, who will consider a man's "power" to be the land at disposition to a considerable extent on his ancestral myth, a slave's greatest misfortune lay in the fact that he had no ancestral home, and hence no rights.

"The slaves came to earth with the first people," they say.

A slave was a stranger in a strange land, unsupported by a chain of ancestors reaching back to the beginning of time. On the whole, captives taken in war were better treated than other slaves, since it was felt that such a misfortune might occur to anyone at any time. They were frequently remembered by their

[50] friends, a further cause for their preferential treatment. A [727] Bella Coola who had been enslaved and ransomed had to [728] undergo a cleansing ceremony to remove the taint of slavery before he could take part in the ceremonies of the community. It was impossible to learn the details of this rite.

[620] A master had complete power over a slave, unaffected by the force of public opinion, since the affairs of a slave, being without relatives, were of no consequence to anyone. Accordingly, the lot of a slave depended on the character of his master, and on his own ability and industry. An industrious slave was valued; such an one would not be traded or sold except through dire necessity, and in course of years he became, as far as actual treatment was concerned, one of the [424] family. Many masters gave their slaves hamat[a] dance prerogatives, expending large sums for the purpose. In such a [49] case the slave might become an influential member of the community, though the fact that he was not free was never forgotten. On the other hand, a master had not the slightest compunction about beating a lazy slave, and could kill him if he so desired. None of the present Bella Coola has heard of such a case; it was considered more sensible to sell or give away an unsatisfactory slave. It was accepted as a matter of course that a master should provide his slaves with food and clothing, since anything produced or obtained by one belonged to him. A slave-owner had full rights to his female slaves, [837] and unquestionably exercised them. The only restraints were the jealousy of his own wife, or wives, and the feeling that it was undignified for a free man to demean himself. It was impossible to learn with even approximate accuracy to what extent intercourse took place between masters and slaves. Probably not a great deal, though there was considerable freedom of relations between slave women and the young men of the community, unrestrained by the pride of chieftainship. When a slave had been faithful for a number of years and had to arrange his marriage with some female slave; once this had taken place, the actual ceremony meted out to him differed only slightly from that shown to a member of the family. In former times it would probably have been difficult for a stranger to tell married slaves from the members of the Bella Coola community until he had been long enough in the country to understand more than appeared on the surface. 527 562

Marriages between Bella Coola men and slave women were not infrequent, while like partnerships between slave men and even the daughters of chiefs were not unknown. In such cases the status of the children depended on the performance of ceremonies to wash from them the stain of their slave blood. While the mother was still pregnant her husband would call guests, not only from his own village, but from foreign villages as well. Presents were given, according to the wealth of the donor, often aided by his immediate family, to "wash the child." Such ceremonies would be repeated several times before birth, and again at that time. Bella Coola sentiment was that such presents gagged the recipients; they knew of the dishonorable ancestry of the child, but the receipt of gifts on his account had wiped away the disgrace. Such a child was able to inherit prerogatives from his mother's old home, duly validated in Bella Coola by valuables, and by his own lavish presents he could silence those who remembered the blot on his ancestry. Similar procedure was carried out if a free woman married a slave. Unless her husband were already owned by one of her family, the woman's father or brother would arrange to purchase him. Then, aided by him, they would give the same type of presents to clear the children from the taint of slavery. If this were not done, the children had only the status of slaves, though, born and brought up in Bella Coola and associating from infancy with their master's children, they were virtually considered members of the family. 431 567 [428]

"Washing the child," during pregnancy and at birth, seemed to cover the taint on its history, but in later years if such a person failed to continue to give ceremonies, people would again talk of his slave-marriage. So, too, for the child or grand- [559] [571]

431 child of a mixed Bella Coola and slave marriage. As long as 527 such an one maintained a position of importance in the com-
527 munity by the distribution of presents, nothing was said, but 578 if he should fail to do so, he could be, and frequently was, [554] insulted by having reference made to his ancestry. In case of dispute or rivalry it was always a temptation to refer to such a blot, but if he had atoned for it with presents, references were considered improper. Unquestionably, memory of slave 522 ancestry was forgotten in course of time if the line was influ-
527 ential, although recollections of the origins were always cur-527 rent for at least two or three generations. At the present time the most influential woman in Bella Coola, the one who has given most presents, is the granddaughter of a Smith Inlet slave. This man had lived in Bella Coola for many years and had married another slave, by whom he had a son. The latter became the husband of an influential Stuo woman. When she became pregnant, her family secured the liberation of her husband, and gave many presents to "wash the child." One daughter was born to this couple, the woman just mentioned.
Her mother's relatives were influential, and her father was [555] such an expert cause-maker that he was able to win an honorable position for his daughter by presents of his handiwork.
The woman, possessed of considerable ability herself, has been able to give many ceremonies and so reach a position of eminence. No one dares insult her by mentioning her ancestry, but everyone knows about it and if her children should fail to hold their position, they would be open to insult on this score.
The woman has validated names and myths derived both from her mother and father, without explaining how the Smith Inlet traditions came to Bella Coola.

To sum up, it may be said that the position of slaves in Bella Coola was not particularly onerous, though it depended entirely on the will of their masters. Without status in the [112] community, a slave could have been abused by a cruel owner, though the public life of the village, where all lived and ate together, tended to break down the unsymmetrically enforced differences of rank.

as a man by the duly validated ownership of a chief's name in law over right. Formerly a slave was never allowed to eat 262 seal, unless he had been the slayer. If many seals are killed, 574 chiefs from adjacent villages are sometimes invited. The chiefs 622 seat themselves according to their proper positions and are [562] first served with the blood-stained grease that floats to the top [527] of the water as the meat is boiling. When cooked, the meat is [628] cut into strips, measured in terms of so many finger breadths, according to the number of guests. The cuts run down each fore-flipper, so that each receives a narrow strip including one of the toes. The head is always given to the herald.[209]

Wealthy chiefs frequently invite their fellows to ordinary meals even when no seal or deer has been killed. On these occasions, as at seal feasts, the guests are designated by their [551] ceremonial names, not by those in general use.

Chiefs are also accustomed to meet for the discussion of 575 matters connected with the winter ceremonial; on such occa- 622 sions their number may be augmented by men of influence in 623 the secret society, though they do not rank as chiefs. Such a meeting is always called when a new member is to be initiated into the hamat'sa society. If there is difference of opinion the influence of even a nemit chief is outweighed by a man of importance in the society. The matter is discussed by all present and a decision reached by general agreement. It is difficult for a white man to understand how such is possible without either a vote, or general recognition by all that the views of some individual must be accepted. The writer was present at one such meeting, and was struck by the manner in which, after considerable, and at times heated, discussion, a consensus of opinion was reached, and accepted even by those who had proposed a contrary course.

Near every village is a place where the chiefs hold such [178] meetings. All the inhabitants know the general locality, but [114] Every effort was made to secure the accuracy of this account, but errors may have crept in on account of the length of time which has elapsed since the ceremony was carried out in full detail.

thus boast that she has three sets of teeth, but as the practice has not found favour in Bella Coola, it is little to her advantage.[9] 585 [177]

These complicated marriage rites are necessary to satisfy the pride of the two families in their origin myths, and the need to establish the resultant children in the paths of their ancestors. Among slaves or others who lack ancestral prerogatives, marriage is an affair of slight worth. Such persons simply live together with little ceremony, though they always try to give at least a feast so that there may be witnesses of the transaction. It is immaterial whether or not they marry their own relatives, since no ancestral prerogatives are to be transmitted. [556] [567] [581]

MARRIED LIFE

Y usually lives in the house of X's father, though economic circumstances may compel her husband to live in her home. If the parents are very wealthy, a house may be built for the young people, but usually their home is one of the bedrooms in the house of X's father; this patrilocal residence exposes Y not only to good advice from her mother-in-law, but often to caustic criticism. The married life of X and Y does not differ materially from that of other young couples in any part of the world, and is accordingly difficult to describe. Although love rarely enters into the original choice of a mate, a serviceable substitute is found in the mutual respect for each other's ancestry, and the knowledge of the importance of the rites performed with the aid of each other's elderly relatives. The young people realize that marriage affects the families of both, and accordingly accept it as a matter of course. The Bella Coola are fond of children. Their birth is a matter of sincere rejoicing, partly because it binds the two families more closely together, but parental affection is one of the strongest Bella Coola characteristics. The parents usually spoil their children; infants, especially, are never chastised and rarely 591 [556] 593 855 [861]

old man came back to Bella Coola with his son, a man about twenty-five years of age. During his absence all his relatives had died, and he was forgotten. He went to the house of a man with whom his ancestors had intermarried generations ago, explained who he was, and was welcomed. The old man and his son have since lived there, although it is doubtful if the owner of the house had ever heard of their existence, and the son cannot even speak the Bella Coola language. 602 476

X and Y themselves are not entirely overlooked in the exchange of presents between their two families. If Y's father is well pleased with his son-in-law he may show this not only publicly, which redounds to his own credit, but by the communication of secret lore such as a special number of nights for ceremonial chastity. Conversely, if Y should not be a kusiut, her father-in-law often asks her father's permission to make her a member of that society. The woman's father is naturally pleased and makes no objections; so she is initiated, using a name and prerogative embodied in her husband's family. Commonly too, they give her one of their ancestral names at any convenient ceremony later than the wedding. In conformity with the rules already explained, if Y should die childless the names return to X's relatives, but if there are children they pass to them. It is said that siusk names can never be transferred in this manner. 606 431 425 [785] [575] [553] [575]

Y's father and other relatives continue to take an interest in her ceremonial welfare and in her personal comfort. If X beats or otherwise abuses her, they expostulate; and if his cruelty becomes unbearable they shelter their daughter when she runs away from her husband. If X should murder Y, she would be revenged by her family. Only one instance of this was known, when the murderer avoided his pursuers by fleeing from the country. As a rule a wife is fairly well treated, though this depends on the character of the husband, the importance of her relatives, and the amount of goods expended to validate the marriage. Among slaves and persons of no influence, it is assumed that a husband may sell his wife as a 593 [602] [627] [567] [432] [648]

593 slave, and this is believed to have occurred on one occasion
527 to the daughter of a chief.

432 Once, many hundred years ago, the daughter of a Bella Coola chief 48 was married to the son of Tsadewaum, a Bella Bella chief, living at Rqaqyul. At the marriage, in Bella Coola, valuable presents were given by both families, and the girl went to live in Bella Bella with her husband. Some ten years later, Tsadewaum gave a large potlatch to which he had invited guests from all parts of the coast. As in duty bound, his daughter-in-law's relatives gave a certain amount of goods to relieve her. They were not wealthy, so that the contribution was of small value. Tsadewaum had expected a larger present, and now found himself unable even to repay his debts to those who had assembled. He did not immediately show his resentment, but soon afterwards sold his daughter-in-law as slave to a Kitkatla chief. The Bella Coola were justly indignant, but could not make up their minds what to do in such an unprecedented case. The girl ultimately escaped and made her way home after lengthy wanderings (II, p. 305).

837 A husband demands faithfulness on the part of his wife, though he himself is often rather lax. Illicit intercourse is regarded, not as a deadly sin, but as an infringement of the husband's prerogatives. But if a woman should bear a child at a time when it was impossible for the husband to have been the father, due to absence, he would probably accept it as his [586] own and do no more than administer a beating, though some jealous men would divorce a wife for this. Bella Coola sentiment on such matters varies with the individual; it is universally considered to be a matter that concerns the husband
[184] alone and he can do as he thinks fit. The daughters of chiefs are usually faithful to their husbands, whereas those of poorer persons, unrestrained by the valuables expended at their mar-
[682] riages, are more lax. If the husband should catch an adulterer, he can, if bold, slay him on the spot and the exaction of blood revenge would be uncalled for. Usually a fight ends the matter, though the offender's family may give presents to the aggrieved husband, and his wife's relatives may also make donations to atone for their daughter's failings. A husband does not share his wife with anyone, and a question as to the lending of a wife

with the others, including the one who had just been leader, as followers. It is said that there was rarely friction among the joint husbands, since each realized that his turn would come as head of the household, and meanwhile the wife endeavoured to share her favours indiscriminately. The children were considered equally the offspring of each husband, thus automatically acquiring membership in several amorous families. Such were regarded as indeed fortunate, provided with every potential means of assistance in the struggle of life. 575 556 [551]

Recognizing its importance, every effort was made to verify this information. Further questioning elicited the statement that the informant had never seen a case of this, though he asserted that when a young man he had often heard of it and that the custom had then only recently died out. Another old man and an elderly woman confirmed the above statement almost word for word, and each added that it was well known when they were young, though they had never actually seen it in practice. One man believed that the custom had formerly prevailed in several parts of the coast, and said that he had heard of its occurrence among the "Kwakiutl" people near Nootka. Considering the reliability of his informants, the writer gives as his personal belief that the institution of polyandry among the daughters of chiefs occurred in Bella Coola not many years ago. Knowledge of the term of address for co-husband, already given, is strong evidence in support of this view. 128 575 556

DISCREDITABLE MARRIAGES

Since it has been assumed that Y is the daughter of a chief, properly married with due formality, it is necessary to digress still further from the account of her relations with X to describe connections of a less creditable nature. The most common of these was with slaves. Though frowned upon by all Bella Coola ethics, such alliances, of a permanent nature, do not appear to have been rare. In some cases it was a man who thus dishonored himself, in some a woman. Since no slave could provide the goods necessary for an elaborate wedding, the 567 588

547 ceremony usually consisted simply of the man and woman
588 living together. In theory, this prevented the children from ever obtaining a name or other prerogative included in the ancestral myth of the free-born parent, and no effort was always made to conceal from them the details of the ancestral family's origin myth. But, as already described in the section dealing with slaves, the expenditure of valuable presents served to weaken, or at least to cover, the blot. If the child succeeded in giving many potlatches, the stain was generally forgotten. On the other hand, if the child of a slave married to a free man was not "washed," he could always be shamed by a reminder of the disgrace of his parents' wedding.

681 In case of murder, the son or other near relative of the [588] victim sometimes accepts a daughter or other member of the offender's family instead of exacting blood revenge. The bride
[627] is delivered to her husband with valuable goods "to wash away the blood," but these never suffice entirely to remove the disgrace from her or her children. The latter may inherit names and prerogatives from their father, but even if they attain to the position of chiefs, they can always be put to shame by reference to their mother's marriage as an atonement for murder. Of course the influence of a great chief makes it impolitic to refer to his ancestry, and there are a few instances of men having reached such a position of eminence that the blot
[554] has been practically forgotten. The wife's family must continue to give presents to the husband for years after marriage, otherwise her lot is unenviable indeed, and her children have the status of the unwashed offspring of a slave and a free-man. In some cases a marriage of this type is entered upon years after a murder, if a son or other descendant wishes to end the anxiety of constantly expecting blood revenge.

REPURCHASE OF THE WIFE

556 Repurchase of a wife is the necessary consequence of every 589 reputable Bella Coola marriage. It is assumed that the pre-

[illegible] faithful and cases of rape were either unknown or very rare. The daughters of chiefs, too, were guarded with great care and any effort to seduce one of them would be punished by her father. The parents of a girl used to watch her carefully, and the opportunity for immorality was not great in the days when everyone went to bed at sundown except on the occasion of a ceremonial dance. As one informant described it:

"The daughters of chiefs used to be looked after as if they were in house, cherished and guarded by their parents and relatives. No one would dream of molesting them. And a chief's daughter used to be proud and look after herself. Nowadays, girls don't care, and everything has become degraded."

If the daughter of a chief did dishonor herself, the parents lost interest in her, as one who was spoilt. It was always assumed that a girl of rank was a virgin at marriage, and if it was discovered that she had been living an immoral life, her husband in many cases returned her in disgrace to her parents who, equally shamed, were expected to send back to him the goods he had expended for their daughter. Loss of virtue was judged only from indirect information. If the daughter of a chief was found pregnant before marriage, she was almost ostracized by her family. No ceremonial marriage could be arranged for her, and the child could not be cleansed from the stigma of illegitimacy.

On the other hand, it appears certain that there was a good deal of intercourse in the old days between chiefs and slave women, or even between slaves and the daughters of chiefs. In the latter case the woman was often cast aside by her relatives though they sometimes yielded to the inevitable and tried to wash away the disgrace with gifts. At the same time, public opinion was unfavourable to a man who consorted with many women, or to a woman who allowed herself to be at the disposal of many men. Any regular union of masters with their slave women for the deliberate purpose of having children was unknown. A girl's consent was always necessary, given either personally or through an intermediary. Even a chief hesitated to force his [illegible] on a slave woman if she objected, although her [illegible] would be most unusual on account of his prestige. There were no professional prostitutes; a man usually gave a small present to a girl from whom he had received favours, and she was expected to give him a little, dainty basket filled with unused cedar-bark to use as a sponge. Such relations appear always to have been of common occurrence. Today, as formerly, a man's morality is considered to be his own affair; laxity may lower his prestige, but no law is broken, and his neighbours laugh and chaff him about it. In fact, sexual matters are discussed with the greatest freedom, and a person who has been caught is mocked mercilessly. When visiting a foreign tribe, a man sometimes lives with a woman and, on parting, composes and sings a song describing her charms. One man did this after living with a Kitlobe woman, and on his return to Bella Coola found that some of his fellows had learnt it in some unexplained manner; they used to sing it to him, much to their amusement, in part to his own, and somewhat to the annoyance of his wife. This perhaps illustrates rather clearly the attitude of the Bella Coola to an infraction of morality—where no marriage rite has been broken; it is amusing rather than disgusting. There are no times when the moral code ceases to function. At potlatches, and also at kusiut dances, there appears always to have been a certain amount of laxity, although this was strictly prohibited within the house where the ceremony was taking place. Such behaviour is due to the excitement and stimulus of a large gathering, not to anything connected with the rites themselves.

Perverted sexual desires, like other matters connected with the relations of the sexes, are regarded as concerning the individual alone.

Sodomy appears to be unknown. Intercourse by pre-adolescents is held to be disgusting, but carries with it no social ostracism. Incestuous union, however, is mildly anti-social; it exposes the offender to secret contempt, but does not interfere with his attainment of whatever position his wealth sense throughout this chapter, and to assume the presence of a number of young men and women ignorant of the significance of the rites. Formerly, the hakuxiut often had difficulty in impressing the uninitiated with their powers, and feuds with the o'ala were common.

Although membership in the hakuxiut society depends on an ancestral prerogative, it is essentially a democratic institution. A certain amount of wealth is necessary to validate a hakuxiut prerogative, but nothing comparable to that required for a potlatch; in fact, poor men are often persons of great importance within the ranks of the society. Nor are the prerogatives considered to be as valuable as ancestral rights, so that slaves are often admitted as hakuxiut by their masters. An important hakuxiut is not esteemed by the community in the same way as the donor of many potlatches; in short, membership in the society brings limited ceremonial and semi-religious advantage, not social prestige of a public nature.

Powers and Functions of the Society

Any secret society can be viewed from the standpoints of a member, and of a non-member. The scope of the hakuxiut organization can be most clearly outlined by describing first what an uninitiated person knows about it. From his infancy, parents impress upon a child the supernatural powers of the hakuxiut and the dangers attached to their rites. Such instruction is perhaps strongest where one, or both, is not a member. They then voice their own fears, and do not merely deceive for the good of the society. Steeped as every child is in a firm belief of the near presence of the supernatural, he readily believes what he is told. He learns, for example, that if, without special invitation, he dares enter the house where a hakuxiut dance is taking place—at any time during the four days or more that it lasts—his spirit will be drawn from him. This is sufficient to deter him from prying too closely into the rites. Strangely enough, there seem always to have been differences in teaching with respect to this deception. It is believed that if a non-

he heats in the fire with his stick, and expresses the hope that the cause of the scandal in the town where the error took place may be blackened within he does better.

As an individual hactcat who sees is punished by a scandal, so is punishment meted out to the members of a village in which any serious accident occurs during a dance. Such disasters are fire, causing concealed hakaciat to appear among the uninitiated, the breaking of a sidewalk on which a number of the members are dancing, or the capsizing of loaded canoes which are used in some of the performances. The obvious effect of such mishaps is to lower the prestige of the hactcat society in the eyes of the uninitiated. The news travels from town to town, and to adjacent tribes. This is a casus belli for any village which wishes to attack the one where the disaster took place; in fact, a raid is considered meritorious. Owing to frequent marriages between the members of neighbouring villages, it usually happens that the inhabitants of adjacent settlements are unwilling to attack, but the news spreads until it reaches a town willing to take the lead. The marshals, aided by any other influential hakaciat, discuss the matter and decide on war; uninitiated are called upon to take part, though they are told only that the foray is connected with the rites of the hactcat society which increases rather than decreases their awe. The threatened villagers, knowing that an attack is inevitable, send out sentinels and guards, and, if possible, flee at the last moment to neighbouring towns for safety, allowing the raiders to burn their village and carry off loot. If a fight takes place many people may be killed, but slaves are never taken. In the last century Itsaa attacked Alqâlâxl; the assailants were aided by a number of Chilkotin to whom they were related but who had not the slightest idea of the cause of the raid. Although an attacked town is usually helped by its neighbours, this is not the case when the assault is caused by error in hactcat or xaxak ceremonial.

Nor is punishment for error or disaster in ritual meted out

It is hoped that this somewhat lengthy description will assist the reader in following the complicated details of the actual rites. 575*

Initiation

Although kactcit ceremonials take place only during the winter, preliminary arrangements are discussed and carried out throughout the year. One of the subjects over which the old men and the marshals debate at length is the admission of new members. Sometimes the relatives of a young man or woman wish to have him, or her, initiated and propose to use a kactcit prerogative dormant in their family. More often an elderly person is willing to transfer one of his prerogatives to a younger relative; comparatively few are unused owing to the small sums needed to validate them. In either case, one of the marshals is consulted. He passes word to his fellows, and to a number of the elderly kakactcit, who meet in the council-place of the village. The prospective novice's relatives are there and express the belief that he is sufficiently mature in mind to be a credit to the society. If some of those present demur, the matter is discussed at length until all agree, or until it appears that there is strong objection on account of the youth or inconsistency in character of the proposed novice. In this case his relatives can only hope that their proposal will be more favourably received the following year. Sometimes the young man or woman is informed that his relatives have exerted their influence with Ka'kilwulnais to make him a kactcit, more often he remains in ignorance until the ceremonial season. [425]

The initiation of one admitted under these normal circumstances is the same as for one made a "shaman" on account of too great knowledge. Sometimes the marshals themselves take the first steps. If few kakactcit wish to give ceremonials so that there are gaps in the nightly performances, the marshals select a suitable slave and ask his owner to give him some kactcit prerogative of little value. If the latter agrees, a pretext is found to lure the victim to the woods whence he is carried, 575* 567● [425]

*[975] struggling in fear, to the secret meeting-place. There the mardhals discuss what shall be done with him; some suggest that he be killed, others a lesser fate, and finally someone advises his initiation. After apparently due deliberation, this is decided upon; the slave is told the mysteries of the society and is warned of the dire fate which will befall him if he tells the uninitiated of his knowledge. The actual ceremonial rites of admission do not vary according to the preliminaries used.

*[976] Initiation can take place at any time during the kwaxa season. After consulting with the mardhals in order to choose an evening when no other dance is to take place, the relatives of the neophyte, whom it will be convenient to term X, invite the kwaxa to their house. Sometimes songs are sung by way of rehearsal, at other times food is distributed at once. As the people are eating, one of the mardhals stands up to address them, saying that X's relatives propose to take him to the repository of the name ———, so that he may become a kwaxa. X, to whom this may be the first intimation, is called from his house and taken from the village by several of his kinsmen, with one or more of the mardhals. The kwaxa disperse and tell the uninitiated in the other houses that X has gone to meet Ăwĭ'ĭtsnalaxa. His companions hear the news with mingled envy and thankfulness that they are not to have this dangerous privilege.

[978] In ancient times X and his guides may actually have proceeded to his repository, but for several generations at least it has been customary for the party merely to go to some lonely spot in the woods for the night. Those accompanying X tell him as much of the ritual of the society as they think fit, not forgetting to emphasize the trust put upon him, and the fate which will befall him if he should communicate his knowledge. [987] He is expected to report that he went to the repository where, [984] lying face downwards on the ground, he saw Ăwĭ'ĭtsnalaxa; in Kimsquit he is supposed also to see her husband.*

[976] *According to one old Bella Coola a sister of Ăwĭ'ĭtsnalaxa also remains in every repository.

[The Cannibal Dance]

in burning the eye if they do not think the dancer will be able to carry it out properly. When the call comes, the uninitiated are at once expelled from the Cannibal's house; later he rushes to the graveyard and exhumes one of the most-filled frames previously buried. Non-members watch with horror as he sinks his teeth in the "flesh." Closely guarded, he is then taken to every house where, if they are held, the uninitiated peer forth from their bedrooms and watch his performance. He carries part of the corpse in his arms and periodically sinks his teeth in the repulsive mass. As usual, apparent attempts are made to tie him to this earth, but in spite of them he escapes to the upper regions where he remains for an unusually long period. Great efforts are made to reduce him to a state of emaciation, for which purpose he drinks large amounts of water in which cedar-wood has been boiled. When the Cannibal ultimately returns to earth, the cannibalistic incubus is expelled and he at length becomes normal. When dancing, a corpse-eater commonly bends both hands towards the floor in front of him and upwards, as though raising some heavy object towards his face. Then his head sinks towards this, only to be thrown quickly upwards and to one side, with a wild expression in his eyes. The uninitiated are told that this represents the manner in which he lifts a corpse towards his mouth and bites, only to be revolted by its putrescence. He has, they hear, no actual liking for human flesh, but his incubus fills him with an irresistible craving for it. Frequently he wears on his blanket wooden representations of skulls (see Plate 71), symbolic of the corpses devoured.

Rarely, a corpse-eating Cannibal kills a slave and pretends to devour his body as a means of impressing the uninitiated, but usually this is done only under the driving force of revenge or jealousy. If a man hears that a near relative, slave of a foreign tribe, has been killed, he often determines to wipe out blood with blood. He consults a corpse-eating Cannibal, and

Eating of corpses has long ceased among the Bella Coola; the present tense is used merely for convenience.

[see category 116, p 164(A) - ANALYST]

[The Cannibal Dance]

If the latter agrees to undertake the commission, he must 575 next obtain a slave, a matter of no difficulty if he is at all 996 wealthy. An effort is made to find a victim from the tribe 567 that has committed the murder, though any alien will suffice. 648
The details are worked out with great care so that the slave is sent to the river for water, or on some other errand at the time the call comes to the Cannibal. A shout is raised, and the uninitiated hurriedly run out of the house, followed by the dancer and a body of athletic kekwiut, who pounce on the unsuspecting foreigner. The Cannibal cuts his throat, and the corpse is carried back to his house, where all members of the society are assembling. Part of the body is cut off, then the kekwiut accompany the Cannibal to every house of the village. He carries the mutilated remains, and the uninitiated readily believe that he has devoured the missing portion. The corpse is later dismembered and the bloody pieces displayed, convincing proof of the gruesome meal. It is needless to say that they are carefully buried where there is no danger that they will be found. The rite then proceeds in the usual manner.

If two biting Cannibals, or their parents, quarrel, they may 575 be shamed into killing and "eating" a slave. Angry words lead 996 to insults, insults to scorn at each other's prowess, until one of 567 the Cannibals throws a stone at the feet of the other, an action 578 which has the significance of:

"Eat that!"

Since a stone is always symbolic of a slave, the Cannibal so taunted knows what is expected. If he accepts the challenge, he throws a stone at his adversary's feet, bidding him do likewise. The one challenged soon receives a call and kills a slave in the manner previously described; his rival must do the same unless he is willing to admit himself outdone. The occasional killing of a slave under such circumstances does not give to either the right of doing so habitually. Of [558] course the challenged individual is not bound to accept, but if he declines the "dare," he sinks in popular estimation. This type of rivalry can be carried out only during the ceremonial season.

After killing and eating a human being, a Cannibal must conceal himself for a considerable period, sometimes as long as four years. The uninitiated are told that the great power within him has taken him so far into the upper regions that one or more years must elapse before his return. During this time he can be seen only by kukwisut. The writer was told of one unfortunate corpse-eating Cannibal, Xetsalas, who was virtually secluded for eight years, since a stone was cast at his feet every time he reappeared, thus forcing him to kill and eat. This name had been dormant for a number of years until conferred on the writer, who failed to uphold the prerogative.

One other type of Cannibal prerogative remains to be described, namely, that of biting oneself. This is even less common than that of corpse-eating, being enjoyed only by two individuals, Spillaakmq of Sisaa and Snamq of the Kimsquit River. The following account of the origin of the latter's prerogative was obtained:

> Many years ago, soon after the first people came to this world, the ritual of the kwisut dances was much more exacting than it is at present. At that time the inhabitants of the earth were still endowed with such semi-supernatural powers that they were able to perform rites that people of the present day can represent only with the aid of carpenters' devices. There was then living in one of the villages on the Kimsquit River a certain Snamq who had the prerogative of biting himself. He once went hunting on one of the mountains, and when he failed to return the people were convinced that he had eaten so heartily of his own flesh that he had died. Although search was made for his body, it was not until the following year that a professional hunter found the skeleton. From the position of the bones it was judged that their conclusion was correct: he had killed himself by eating too much of his own flesh. The chiefs and other influential kukwisut held a meeting at which it was decided that henceforth kwisut dances would only be acted, not carried out in reality. The following winter the name and prerogative were transmitted to the son of the dead man, who bit himself, but not sufficiently deeply to cause serious injury.

726 cold sticks to sleep. Meanwhile, their wives at home were 724 required to be very careful, since a woman's loudness playing 722 would cause injury to her husband, and faithlessness, his death. These restrictions were obligatory during the absence of the expedition.

726 As the party neared the enemy's country, they would conceal the craft under projecting trees by day and travel only at night. When within striking distance, a scouting canoe was sent forward to learn the hostile dispositions, the best means of approach, and so forth. This was usually done at dusk, and when the scouts had returned, the party would steal quietly through the forest and hide behind the unsuspecting village. At dawn the leader would give the signal, and the attackers would rush forward with a fierce shout, killing all the men and [727] seizing women and children as slaves. When captives were [422] taken by slave members of the expedition, they belonged to the latter's masters. The victors would cut off the heads of their victims, seize what loot they could, set fire to the village [567] and rush home before support could arrive from neighbouring towns. At first, the slaughter was usually a somewhat unpleasant task, but as the warriors became inflamed with the heat of battle, they began to delight in killing, and even women and children frequently suffered.

727 The exulting victors sped homewards, rejoicing at their success but somewhat fearful that they might be cut off by overwhelming reinforcements. During the journey, each warrior who had taken a head removed the scalp by cutting the skin around the cranium close above the eyebrows and ears. These trophies were washed at the rock Skulzumanta on the ford below Bella Coola. When within sight of home, the [583] captain stood up in the canoe and sang again his xe-tla song, a symbol of victory as the bloody scalps were held aloft. Women and children would rush forth to greet the conquerors who landed amid scenes of wild enthusiasm and rejoicing.

[422] Prisoners of war became the property of those who had [567] taken them, with the exception of those captured by slaves.

If the war had one hour of long duration in which unusually [727] brave findings had been around, captives were often rendered by their relatives, who were considered for the purpose when the hour of battle had subsided. Failing this, prisoners remained as slaves, the children especially growing up virtually [726] as members of their owner's family as far as food and clothing were concerned, though never sharing in the prowess of his ancestral family. Torture or killing of prisoners seems to have been a rare practice. One extremely old Kwaguis woman related that in her childhood she had seen a captive crushed out on the hot rocks on the side of the ocean, fastened there, his mouth crushed with stones, and allowed to die. No other similar traditions could be obtained and it seems probable that this must have been an unusual case. It is true that hostilities have long ceased, but the Bella Coola have clear recollections of other long-abandoned customs, and it is unlikely that torture was ever a common occurrence. It is, of course, one about which reticence is to be expected, but information would have been obtainable if the custom had been common or if it had been one which played an important part in the lives of the Bella Coola.

Scalps were hung on a cord and dried like salmon, then [722] suspended as valuable trophies in the taker's house. When setting out on a war expedition, he would often cover his head [714] with one, holding it in position by weaving its hair into his own.
At a man's death, they were either inherited by his heirs or, [768] more often, burnt with his other possessions. It is said that the Fort Rupert people used to tie scalps in bundles to their masks. When the Bella Coola went to war to retaliate [721] for a murder, instead of scalping a victim, they sometimes [748] brought back his whole head and impaled it on a stake over [682] the grave of the person avenged.

At this late period it is virtually impossible to form any [721] opinion as to the amount of bloodshed in wars waged by the Bella Coola. Several of the older people spoke in gloating terms of the slaughter accomplished by their ancestors, but all

B 721 these accounts seemed to be exaggerations, and the casualties were probably few. The Bella Coola did not have the same admiration for the successful warrior as for the man who gave many potlatches, while everything indicates that their raids were on a small scale, rendered singularly ineffective by lack of discipline.

Swanton: Accounts

Active warfare has been so long discontinued on the coast that none of the living Bella Coola can describe conditions as they existed during hostilities. It was possible to collect the following accounts of raids and adventures which, though individually of small value, illustrate tactics and strategy, and recount incidents which throw light on the frame of mind of the participants.

KITKATLA WAR

For many years there was animosity between the Bella Coola and the Kitkatla who, with the advantage of strong government, used to sweep down from the north for salmon and slaves. Bella Coola itself was comparatively immune from attack, but the Kimsquit people suffered severely. The attackers were not always successful; one old man related how, when his mother's mother was an infant, they were driven off with the loss of four canoes and many men. The fact that this incident had been remembered for so many years indicates that it was unusual.

B T 567 [illegible] [727]

Slaves captured in this way were traded from tribe to tribe and rarely escaped. When an elderly Bella Coola was a lad, there was considerable excitement in the community owing to the return of Sîskwala, a woman who had been carried off when a girl. She had been traded to a northern tribe among whom, she said, it was customary to crush captives beneath totem-poles and house-posts. Her diligence saved her from this fate, and she was passed on until she reached the far north, on the shore of a river where "the white man got money stone." Then Slukwala began to go south, and was finally sold to an important chief living north of Fort Simpson. He used to beat her; in fact, she carried the scars with her to her grave. Slukwala's master had another slave, a male Bella Bella, with whom the woman was on friendly terms since she was related by blood to a Bella Bella family and could speak that language. Angered by her harsh treatment, Slukwala suggested to her companion in misfortune that they kill their master and escape. The man was at first unwilling, but she assured him that she knew the route southward. The conspirators awaited their opportunity which came when their master went halibut fishing, accompanied only by his two slaves. One evening Slukwala cooked a large meal for him which made him drowsy as he sat by the fire; then she stole behind him, picked up an axe, and killed him by hitting him over the head. The two murderers carefully scraped up all the blood, tied stones to the corpse, and sank it in deep water so that their master's friends would believe that he had been drowned with his slaves. Then the two, having stolen a canoe, paddled off, hiding by day, and subsisting on what shell-fish they could gather. After many perils they reached Bella Bella, whence Slukwala returned home.

She had been carried off as a mere girl, but was past the age of child-bearing when she returned and had almost forgotten her native language. The Bella Coola were keenly interested in the tale of her adventures, and especially in the way that slaves were buried in Alaska. It was assumed that some of their own captives must have been killed in that way, so a slave from the far north was crushed in revenge. It is said that this custom was common among the northern tribes from whom the Bella Coola adopted several practices, although this particular one was carried out but once.

The most famous Kitkatla chief, and the one most dreaded by the Bella Coola, was Tsihsa, who is said to have had almost despotic powers over his northern warriors. The name itself was transmitted from one holder to another, but the most

The other opened, as they paddled in and landed at the bottom of the village, heedless of the fact that it was full of Carriers. The Nuxalkt people seem to have remained passive, but the angry Carriers came rushing forth and Ts'ètsèm spoke proudly to them:

"You would be dead as your chief if we had not lost our weapons."

The two brothers walked slowly up the long sidewalk of the village, while the Carriers skulked around, uttering threats, casting curses and shooting arrows. Some of the latter stuck in their backs, but long previously both Ts'ètsèm and Ts'ètsèm had taken part of a cuisat which had rendered their bodies impervious to such wounds. Arrived at the upper end of the village, they stopped and waited, making no attempt to defend themselves, until they were killed. At intervals throughout the day the Carriers treated the two bodies with ignominy, now throwing spears into them, now beating them, and all this time not a single Bella Coola dared even to protest, so much were they filled with fear of the Carriers who, when roused as they then were, fight like mad dogs. In the late afternoon one of the women thrust a knife into the eyes of the fallen warriors. Even this insult did not rouse the Nuxalkt people themselves, but Winds, one of their slaves, felt called upon to take action. Before being captured, he had been a person of importance in his own home and the Bella Coola had allowed him to become a leading member of the Sisiutl society; in the course of time he had become entirely reconciled to his fate, and even thought as a Bella Coola which gave him the necessary assurance to address the Carriers.

"Wu, wu," he said. "See the breadth of the sky.[11] I have never seen, nor have I even heard of such a thing as you have done today. Truly you have wiped your feet on all that is sacred and powerful."

This speech for the first time brought the enormity of their offence home to the Carriers. The actual taking of life did not affright them, but in their excitement they had overlooked what was to Winds the most obvious sin: they had passed and repassed on the sidewalk outside a house where a Sisiutl dance was taking place. Thus reminded of the danger to which they had exposed themselves, the Carriers withdrew.

Next day the Nuxalkt people buried the four victims. Ts'ètsèm had been a mighty chief and, being distantly related, they would normally have given him an elaborate funeral, but now they acted as if dazed and unaware of his prowess. A man who owned a powerful medicine put some of it in the eyes of the two who had been mutilated by the Carrier woman; as the bodies began to decompose, those who had killed them began to suffer from eye-trouble, and the woman became blind. Believing that their sin had caused their misfortunes, the Carriers fled home.

[11] To call attention in this way to the breadth of the universe carries with it the implication that it will fall to crush those who have broken a sacred law.

525 he is wrong, he pays them. It is said that in former times each stick used to be painted with a special device, and that each had its own name; even now they are beautifully made and highly polished by much passing from hand to hand. The Carriers [171] play the same game but use beaver teeth instead of sticks. Formerly it was not uncommon for a man to bet his goods, his wives and children, and even himself at this game. If he lost, [567] the persons so wagered became slaves of the victor unless [575] redeemed by their friends. Women, too, gambled freely; in fact, neophytes recently admitted into the kusiut society were the only ones to whom this pastime was forbidden.

526 Of actual games, the one most commonly played is shlsa. As many as eight or ten contestants can take part, each providing himself with one, two, or three stones,[1] pecked down to the proper shape. Each is about six inches in length, three inches wide, flat on one side, and oval on the other, well rounded at either end. Before the coming of the white man, when the Bella Coola habitually used stone, it is said that one of these could be made in a few minutes. A mark is set up, and the first player throws his missile in the air, endeavouring to make it come to rest as close as possible to the target. The game is usually played on an open space near the village, but even on comparatively smooth ground there is great chance of bouncing and the thrower must gauge this possibility as well as have correct direction and distance. The second player likewise throws his stone, trying to land it nearer the target, or to knock away his rival's. In so doing, the latter, lying on the ground, is often broken, which puts its owner out of the game for the time being. When all have thrown, the one who has come nearest the mark is the winner. Sometimes each contestant throws two or more stones, and sometimes sides are chosen. Large numbers of broken gaming stones can be found [172] near every old village site, confirming the statements of the older men and women concerning the universality of the sport

[1] Likewise called shlsa, a name said either to be derived from that of a fungus, or that the latter is derived from it.

142 sally used but the older people state that beards were by no
144 means rare in former times. Careful inquiries were made [302] concerning the ancestry of a man, about seventy years of age in 1922, whose curly beard suggests that he must be a half-breed, as indeed he is assumed to be by the white settlers of the valley. His father was Pattsi, the most influential chief of recent years, his mother was herself the daughter of an important chief. None of the older men had ever heard the slightest rumour of faithlessness on her part. There were white [648] traders on the coast at the time of his birth, and intercourse with [567] slave women and others of low family was not uncommon, but [622] it would have been difficult for a chief's wife to misconduct herself, and still more difficult for her to conceal all knowledge of it in view of the open life which prevailed at that period. Moreover, it is said that Pattsi himself had a similar beard, as did also the parents of several men who in 1922 were fifty or sixty years of age.

142 Although the possibility of white mixture cannot be over-144 looked in the case of this one individual, one must not dis-
826 regard the opinion of the people themselves on hairiness in general. They are proud of it and regard beards and mous-
[302] taches as marks of virility given to them by Alquntám; baldness and lack of facial hair are considered a sign of weakness. They aver that their fathers and grandfathers were even more hirsute than they. Furthermore, they point out with pride
[186] that this is a difference between themselves and the tribes of the interior, who are, as they say in scorn, "hairless like Chinamen." Finally, it is noteworthy that the hair on the head of many Bella Coola is wavy, or even curly (see Plate 20), instead of straight as among the majority of Indian tribes.[1]

Character

181 It is an almost impossible task to describe briefly the characteristics of a people. Those of the Bella Coola have repeatedly. Every time the sacred objects of a gens are shown to the 614 people a potlatch is given. The sacred objects, although the property of the 532 various gentes, must nevertheless be acquired by each individual. That 422 is to say, every free person has the right to acquire a certain group of 556 carvings and names, according to the gens to which he or she belongs.

Slaves and slaves' children, also illegitimate children, could not become Sisaʼxit. A person cannot take a new carving, but must wait until it is [567] given to him by his relatives—father, mother, or elder brother. Nesk'a- [848] la'xin, to whom I owe my information regarding the gentes, and who is a member of the gens Tale'xtimit of the Talio'xit, stated that he had received the raven when he gave his first potlatch. At his second potlatch [115]
he received the eagle. He hopes that his mother will give him the whale at his next potlatch, and will at the same time divulge to him the secrets connected with it. In course of time, he said, he might get even others from his brother; but if the latter's children should prove to be very good, and develop very rapidly, his brother would probably give his secrets to his children. At festivals, when a person acquires a new secret, he 614 changes his name. Each person has two names, a Ki'xitit name, which 424 remains the same throughout life; and a Qi'xtalos name, which is changed 551 at these festivals. Thus, Nesk'ela'xa'a (which is his Ki'xitit name) 556 present Qi'xtalos name is Ati'xtoxsa'lisa'xin, but at his next potlatch he 575 intends to take the name of Kalia'xin. These names are also the property of the various gentes, each gens having its own names. In the list of gentes given above, the names enumerated are the Ki'xitit names of the members. In two cases only the Qi'xtalos names have been ascertained 424 (see p. 419). When a man possesses several Sisaʼxit secrets he will dis- 575 tribute them among his children. When a girl marries, her father or 614 mother may, after a child has been born to her, give one or several of their Sisaʼxit secrets to her husband, as his children make him a member of the gens. When a person gets to be old he gives away all his Sisaʼxit secrets. After any secret has been given away the giver must not use it [426] any more. The crest and the Sisaʼxit carvings must not be loaned to others, but each person must keep his own carvings. The only exceptions are the carved headdresses and the raven rattles, which are not the property of any particular gens.

The laws regarding the potlatch are similar to those of the Kwakiutl. 556
The receiver of a present becomes the debtor of the person who gave 426
the potlatch. If the latter should die the debts become due to his heirs. If the debtor should die his heirs become responsible for the debt. Property is also destroyed at potlatches. This is not returned, and serves only to enhance the social position of the individual who performed this act. It is not necessary that all the property given by a person at a potlatch should be owned by him. He may borrow part of it from his friends, and has to repay it with interest. I was told, for instance, that a man borrowed a large copper-plate and burnt it also potlatch. When doing so he had to name the price which he was going to pay to the owner in its stead. Since that feast he died, and his heirs are now responsible for the amount named at the potlatch.

The Ki'xitit is presided over by a female spirit, called Aneikitsa'a. 575
Her abode is a cave in the woods, which she occupies from February 773 till October, remaining all the while inside. In October she opens the 776 door of her cave and sits in front of it. A woman is said to have been the first to find her. Aneikitsa'a invited her into her cave and taught

go with the mother and part with the father. The decision is left to the parents and children. 586

When a person has died the corpse is washed, the face painted red, the legs are doubled up, and the arms folded over the breast. The nose-ornament of the deceased is put into his nose; his shirt is put on, the back part covering the breast and the front part turned backward. The body is placed in a box and the latter is either fastened on the lower branches of a tree or placed in a little house, which is set on posts, above the level of the ground. The face of the deceased is turned eastward. Part of his property and gifts from his friends are deposited near the grave. The masks of the deceased are burnt. His crest is carved on a memorial column, which also shows how many canoes, coppers, head-dresses, and slaves he had given away at potlatches. These objects are painted or carved on the columns. Formerly slaves were killed at the burial of chiefs. The number of slaves killed was also indicated by so many human figures on the memorial column. After burial food for the use of the deceased is thrown into the fire. This is repeated frequently during a prolonged period after the death has occurred. Whenever the friends of the deceased partake of a meal a little food is thrown down at a place between the fire and the door, where the entrance to the lower world, the home of the dead, is believed to be. 764 [301] [823] [766] [567] [775]

The bed of a mourner must be protected against the ghost of the deceased. His male relatives stick a thorn-bush into the ground at each corner of their beds. After four days these are thrown into the water. Mourners must rise early and go into the woods, where they stick four thorn-bushes into the ground, at the corners of a square, in which they cleanse themselves by rubbing their bodies with cedar-branches. They also swim in ponds. After swimming they cleave four small trees and creep through the clefts, following the course of the sun. This they do on four subsequent mornings, cleaving new trees every day. Mourners wet their hair short. The hair that has been cut off is burnt. If they should not observe these regulations it is believed that they would dream of the deceased. Women when mourning scratch their cheeks with shells or stones. 765 783 [775] 765 [302]

The mourning regulations for a widower or a widow are especially strict. For four days he (or she) must fast, and must not speak a word, else the dead wife or husband would lay a hand on the mouth of the offender, who would then die. They must not go near water, and are forbidden to catch or eat salmon for a whole year. For the same length of time they must not eat fresh herring or olachen. Widow and widower cleanse themselves in the same way as other mourners. Their shadows are considered unlucky, and must not fall on any person. [262] [828] [822]

Some time after the death of a rich or influential person his nearest relative invites the whole tribe to a potlatch. On this occasion he sings a mourning song for the deceased and gives away presents to his guests. It was explained to me that this ended the mourning, and that it was 'the same as giving away the bones of the deceased.' 765 556

every morning when the sun rises. He takes care that he rises properly. The first six of these deities are grouped in pairs, and are believed to paint their faces with designs representing moon, stars, and rainbow. In the kā'siut these deities make their appearance, and are represented by masks. Xē'mtsioa and Xēmxēmalā'oLa wear the design of the full moon, indicated on the mask of Xē'mtsioa by a double curved line in red and black, the black outside, passing over forehead, cheeks, and upper lip. Xēmxēmalā'oLa has a double curved line in red and black, the red outside, which passes over forehead, cheeks, and chin. Aiumki'lik·a and Ainmalā'oLa wear the design of the crescent, drawn in red and black, with differences similar to those between the first and second masks. The fifth Q'ōmq'ōmki'lik·a and Q'ō'mtsioa have designs representing stars, both wearing the same style of mask. The seventh is Qula'xawa, whose face represents the blossom of a salmon-berry bush. The next in order, Kulō'lias (who wants to have blankets first), wears the design of the rainbow in black and blue. The ninth, At'amā'k, wears on the head a mask representing a kingfisher, and is clothed in a bird-skin blanket. The last of the series is a woman called L'ētsā'aplēLāna (the eater), the sister of the others. Her face is painted with the design of a bladder filled with grease. She figures in several legends as stealing provisions and pursued by the people whom she has robbed. 556 773 776 532 575 776

The sisau'k·, which is danced at potlatches and other festivals of the clans, is presided over by a being that lives in the sun. A man who had gone out hunting met the sisau'k· and was instructed by him in the secrets of the dance. When he returned, he asked the people to clean their houses and to strew them with clean sand before he consented to enter. Then he danced the sisau'k· and told the people what he had seen. He said that the being had commanded them to perform this dance and to adorn themselves when dancing with carved headdresses with trails of ermine skins, and to swing carved rattles. The man, later on, returned to the sun. Ever since that time the Bi'lxula dance the sisau'k·. Besides this, it is stated that the raven gave each clan its secrets. Each clan has its peculiar carvings, which are used in the sisau'k· only, and are otherwise kept a profound secret, i. e., they are the sacred possessions of each clan. All clans, however, wear the beautiful carved headdresses and use the raven rattles, regardless of the carving they represent. Every time the sacred objects of a clan are shown to the people a potlatch is given. The sacred objects, although the property of the various clans, must nevertheless be acquired by each individual—that is to say, every free person has the right to acquire a certain group of carvings and names, according to the clan to which he or she belongs. Slaves and slaves' children, also illegitimate children, can not become sisau'k·. A person can not take a new carving, but must wait until it is given to him by his relatives—father, mother, or older brother. 556 769 a man and assuage his sorrow to know that he has shown fitting respect to the dead, there is also a gain in social prestige. As the whole community respects, admires, and sometimes envies a man for having carried out a memorial potlatch, there is no doubt that he is pleased and gratified to such an extent that his grief is dulled. These two factors must constantly be kept in mind; memorial potlatches serve to commemorate the dead, but in so doing they add to the social importance of the donors. The two combine to bring considerable comfort to the chief who has lost a dear relative. In some cases the social prestige is the real motive, the grief assumed and unimportant; but in others the latter is the only factor that matters, and a chief is entirely oblivious to any increase in his own status. In most memorial potlatches, both feelings are present in the mind of the donor, and both are gratified.

DETAILED ACCOUNT OF A FUNERAL

764 114 In the preceding pages, an attempt has been made to describe the traditional death rites of the Bella Coola. The following section comprises a detailed account of funeral ceremonies witnessed in 1922. The contrast between these and the ones already recorded, will indicate some of the changes [178] in custom which are of such importance in studies of cultural [182] growth or decline. The following description will also serve to demonstrate a point repeatedly mentioned, the manner in [571] which business transactions and arrangements of all kinds take place whenever the people have been called together.

[123] On June 27, 1922, the death occurred in Bella Coola of Jessie, Mrs. Samuel King, daughter of Captain Schooner. The latter, now deceased, was one of the writer's most trusted friends, and as a result of this friendship it was possible not only to attend the actual rites, but to ascertain much of the feeling underlying them. This advantage had its drawbacks, since it was manifestly impossible to question either the father or the husband of the woman too closely. The details will be de-

*575 sticks, while everyone calls out, hoip. This is repeated four *796 times. The sticks continue to sound irregularly as the younger [787] men pull the enclosure to pieces and throw it on the central fire. By these means the kukusiut have been freed from their contact with the supernatural and, perhaps even more important, the repositories have been "tied up," to use the native term, for another year. Those members of the society whose dances have taken place in the house now wash the black from their faces and all share a light meal. The marshals take this last opportunity of addressing their fellows, impressing on them the necessity of maintaining the secrecy of the rites during the summer season. Above all, they warn them to hide the whistles and other paraphernalia most carefully. This concludes the season's ceremony in the house in question; some of the kukusiut withdraw, others remain, and the uninitiated are free to enter and take up the old threads of family life, as it was before the coming of the first call.

If it is not too late at night the party may move to a second house and remove the taboo from it in the same way. More often this is done on the following night, when a second body of kukusiut are allowed to wash. Another house is visited on the next evening, and so on in succession till all the enclosures are burnt and the only visible mark of what has happened is the collar of dyed cedar-bark worn by each novice.

There may be certain prerogatives connected with this [424] finale which could not be learnt owing to its discontinuance for many years. In fact, one old woman claimed to have a definite right to sing at the destruction of the enclosures, but it was unfortunately impossible to investigate the matter.

Concluding Observations and History

It is virtually impossible to overestimate the importance of the sociological aspects of the society. During the ceremonial season the whole fabric of social life is altered; families are divided, parents and children being separated in many cases though an infant in arms, though uninitiated, can be brought to dances by its mother; distinctions between rich and poor, slave and freeman, become of slight importance; all that really matters is whether a person is or is not a kusiut. Membership in the society seems to the uninitiated the most desirable thing in life, although their fears are always so strong that they never cease to dread actual admission. The feeling of class consciousness which exists in a somewhat mild form at other seasons of the year, gives place to a powerful sentiment of superiority on the part of members of the society over those who are not so fortunate. Even the respect normally shown to chiefs is submerged since they, too, are subject to the rule of the marshals.

Apart entirely from this attitude of superiority and inferiority, is the bond of fellowship engendered among members of the society by the rites. Whatever happens, the uninitiated must be deceived. Moreover, the psychological effect of gathering nightly in a body for a specific purpose is tremendous. Night after night they eat together; night after night they listen to the words of the marshals, who impress on them the need for co-operation and secrecy, who hold before them the good example set by their fellows who have carried out rites successfully, who emphasize the fact that they are doing as their fathers did. The ceremonial import is of greatest consequence at all these gatherings, but when the uninitiated have withdrawn the kukusiut relax somewhat and enjoy themselves. The food itself is always of the best and some of the usual restrictions are removed. It is, for example, the only time that women are allowed to eat the flesh of seals. If this delicacy is provided the marshals enjoy the tidbits, but after Cannibals, novices, and others have received preferential treatment, the remainder is distributed to all and sundry.

[262] 562 [264]

It has been stated by some writers, especially those unfamiliar with the significance of native ceremonial life, that the dances of the coastal tribes are orgies of immorality. This point was investigated with care and it may be stated posi-

since each fisherman provided one when his box was filled. 226

No one is allowed to drink water immediately after eating the first olachen of the spring, since to do so would cause a flood. It is considered most improper for a child to cry soon after partaking of this food; if he does so, he is quieted by having nettles stuffed into his mouth. As already described, if a person dies before the first fish have passed through his bowels, a shaman must wipe his lips with cedar-bark. 796 574 [865]

After the first meal of olachen, stakes for the nets can be driven, and the restrictions become less exacting. Women are not allowed to assist in fishing, but the men devote their full time to the task, working with zest and energy.[7] An abundant supply of olachen is a source of joy, and all listen eagerly for the singing of the thrush, smixmixaxts, which signifies that the nets are full to bursting. Half jocularly, people invite the bird to come and eat, but his melody is interpreted as: 226 [562] [825]

"I shall eat when the river is full."

RITES CONNECTED WITH THE FIRST SPRING SALMON[8]

Salmon is the most important article of Bella Coola diet and the rites which accompany the earliest taking of the fish are relatively complicated. 226 796 [262]

When the first spring salmon have been caught, they are laid in the canoe with their heads all pointing eastward, upstream. The fisherman poles to shore, but instead of landing his catch, he fastens the salmon to a stake driven at the edge of the bank so that they remain in the water. A number of posts are usually placed in readiness, each decorated with alternate spirals of dyed and undyed cedar-bark and crowned with an eagle's tail. Each day one or two more fish may be caught, but all are left in the water until the first have become soft, thus giving sufficient time for the necessary preparations on shore. It is the duty of every owner of a salmon-weir to build near its end a so-called Spring Salmon House, a shed-like [343]

women listening from the village are able to tell how many have been caught from the number of times the cry xak'loi· is raised. 226 796

Then the salmon are cut up (only shell knives may be used for the purpose) and cooked. Everything must be used, heads, bones, and entrails, the only refuse being the blood which is scraped from the leaves and carried into the woods. The leaves themselves, and the strings of dyed and undyed cedar-bark are thrown into the river in accordance with a desire expressed by Noākymm long ago. When everything is ready for a meal, the men take their places in two rows, facing each other across a coarse bark mat. Bark spoons have been provided, and when the heralds call for food, the fisherman brings the heads of the salmon and the guests make the motions of eating, though in reality these parts are dried and kept for winter. Boxes containing a liberal portion of the choice meat are next served and all eat freely. Each guest puts on one side what he has not consumed as if to carry it away, as is the custom at an ordinary feast, though his share is really left in the shelter until the following day. Finally, a third course is provided, the back of the fish cooked with the bone in position. Like the last, the guests eat as much as they desire and pack up the residue as if to take away. Then they leave the Spring Salmon House. [412] 226 796 574 [251]

All the fish are not cooked on the one occasion. The following day the fisherman again calls back the men of his village. The same type of meal is served, but this time the guests carry away what they do not eat for the benefit of their families. This portion may be eaten by the women without affronting the salmon. [562]

This rite has not been performed in full detail in Bella Coola for many years, and it was impossible to collect information on some points. It is uncertain, for example, whether this ceremony was carried out by every fisherman or whether there used to be certain individuals with the prerogative of dealing with the first catch. The latter appears to be the most logical 226 796 424

226 manner, and was definitely stated to be the case by one well-796 informed old man. It is clear, however, that every spring salmon was landed with the cry of xak'loi·, taken to the Spring [424] Salmon House, and cut up by the men until the time when women were allowed near the river. Another old man stated [574] that the feast took place at night and that only the heads and [251] refuse of the first catch were eaten, the remainder being dried for the winter. Women of child-bearing age were not allowed [562] on the river bank, and were rigorously excluded from the Spring Salmon House until the time when the sun's shadow reached a diagonal scar on the slope of one of the mountains on the north side of North Bentinck Arm. This occurs about August. From that time onwards, there was no calling of xak'loi·, and women, except those who were taboo, could cut salmon freely on the bank. It was even stated that refuse of salmon could be thrown into the river after that time. No one knows the origin of this seasonal prohibition, or why it should end when the sun reaches a certain point, but it was faithfully observed in former times.

In Kimsquit similar rites were carried out, the chief variation being that the bodies of four swans were placed in the Spring Salmon House and the fish laid with these at intervals in the line. Moreover, the youth used to bite the back of each salmon as he presented it with the cedar-bark streamer. The same regulations with regard to drinking water, and crying after eating, were enforced for spring salmon as for olachen.

Miscellaneous Beliefs

372 The following miscellaneous beliefs and customs cannot be assigned to any special aspect of Bella Coola life:

If a spark from a fire jumps out and lights on a person's hand, it is said:

"The fire wants to give you [the person on whom the brand has fallen] food."

827 If a man sneezes repeatedly, it is said:

of his relatives, has given them for this purpose. When he crouches during the chorus they crowd close around, almost concealing him. Particularly in those dances fraught with danger to the performer, it is customary for any number of his friends, either men or women, to dance to "help" him. Anyone wishing to do so merely stands up and begins, in time to the music, irrespective of what part of the house he may be in. It is considered contrary to good manners for a father so to help his son, or a brother a brother, but a dancer is pleased to have aid from anyone else. It is said that in Bella Bella certain kukusiut have definite prerogatives of helping in this way, but this is not the case in Bella Coola. Throughout every dance the kukusiut women utter their droning cry. 575* 796x 535 [593] [171] [533]

This, then, is the type of dance which the uninitiated in the lowest house see. They hear the song, too, and gaze with awe at X, imbued as he is with the supernatural power of sight. Then the sounding-boards are picked up and taken to the next house, where the whole ceremonial is repeated. This is done at each house of the village.[19] All the kukusiut now return to X's house, where he once more dances to his song. A box-drum is always used to help the singers in keeping time, and when the song has been finished two men continue in turn to beat it all day. X always arranges to have a relative or friend superintend the distribution of food, which follows his final dancing. As the kukusiut are eating, the marshals deliver their usual admonishments, a task that accompanies every meal. Then they call on the people to erect a raised platform between the fire and the back-wall of the house. Materials have been placed in readiness so that it is an easy matter to build a framework a few feet in height, of which the flat top is screened by a matting wall about three feet high. This is often decorated with designs of dyed cedar-bark without ritual significance as far as the Bella Coola of today are aware. X climbs to this platform, the kukusiut disperse, and only the incessant pounding of the drum proves that some unusual event is taking place. 575* 796x [534] [574] [531]

*575 This ejaculation is supposed to make the work of manu-
*796 facture less difficult. The same procedure is repeated with 532 every mask ordered, except that if the being to be represented [789] is a woman, X's ejaculation is i ..... Any kusiut can make a mask, but the preference is always given to a man who has shown ability in previous tasks. The carpenters endeavour to follow well-recognized designs for many representations, but a great deal of latitude is allowed, and a workman receives greater praise and fame for turning out a fine and distinctive piece of new design, than for rigid adherence to a former type. This, combined with the burning of masks and consequent loss of permanent patterns, is responsible for the variability in Bella Coola forms, and the difficulty which they themselves experience in recognizing portrayed beings.

*575 As soon as all the carpentry has been allotted, the singers
*796 strike up one of X's eight songs. Whether or not he dances [533] to them is a matter about which there is a difference of opinion among informants. In any case the re-singing on nusiutälsap is purely for rehearsal, made necessary by the large number of songs. Later on in the kusiut season, the songs of other dancers may be practised on this night, and if the owners wish to practice their steps, it is quite proper for them to do so.
[574] Finally, a meal is distributed, while the marshals discourse in [431] the usual way. Feasts are features of all kusiut dances, and the [421] food distributed is regarded as a free-will gift, without thought of repayment. After eating, the kukusiut disperse; X must sleep within his own house, but no longer remains within his platform-enclosure.

*575 The next day, the twenty-sixth of the ceremony, is gotlm.
*796 Early in the morning a herald summons to X's house, where 532 the blocks have been left, all those to whom work has been assigned. All morning they carve diligently. The speed with [203] which masks are completed is surprising, although this has undoubtedly increased since the introduction of metal tools.
[177] In the middle of the day a few kukusiut men, no women, are supposed to have taught them, he appears, supported by two kukusiut, and attempts to dance, but is too feeble to do more than be assisted around the fire, feebly shaking his hands. He retires, but comes forth once more as the singers beat out the song of regular kusiut type composed for him and which his fellows have practised. If two have been composed, he appears a third time. After X has finally withdrawn, the ritual proceeds in the usual manner, by the dancing of every kusiut who has had a call in time to his two songs. It is late before all have danced; then the uninitiated are given a little food and sent away. The kukusiut eat more leisurely, and listen to the admonitions of the marshals. On account of the solemnity of the occasion, their words of wisdom are even more grandiloquent than usual. The following may be regarded as a typical address: 575* 796* [574] 575* 796* 537

"You have done well, ye kukusiut, in thus carrying out the ceremony so admirably. I thank you. You have done well X, you have done as our fathers did. None of you must ever forget the precepts and example of our fathers who have handed down this rite from dim antiquity. Perhaps when we marshals are dead some of you will become careless and want to alter the ceremonial. Do not dream of anything so foolish. The proper method is that which you have just seen. Try no other."

When the marshals have finished, X dances once again, and the weary kukusiut at length disperse.

The next day, or rather later in the same day, for it is long after midnight before the ceremony is completed, is nebusam. Many of the kukusiut assemble in X's house about four o'clock in the afternoon to try on the masks and attend to the innumerable details. A representation of Ano'likwolsaix is always prepared, as well as those of Alquntām, Sexsexkālaix, and Snusilkāls. The last-named is the "Wise One," "He of Whom Questions are Asked," the supernatural being who decides points of ritual in the dances in the land above. No paint is used on his mask, but a coloured effect is obtained by means 575* 796* 532 [776]

[The Mystery Dance]

*575 This is such an important occasion that leading kukusiut from *796 neighbouring towns are often invited to be present. If this is to be done, heralds are sent for the purpose during the following [574] day.

Next evening the kukusiut are invited to X's house in the usual manner, many of them unaware that the answer is soon to be given. The customary ritual is carried out and the uninitiated summoned in due course. By this time X is supposed to have been weakened by his long fast, and to give colour to that claim, two assistants support him as he totters feebly to and fro in his enclosure. Instead of waving his stick horizontally above his head, X now rests his weight on it, with his helpers holding the ends. After the customary frenzied beating with sticks, X again invites guesses, but still no one can find the three answers. Meanwhile the father or some elderly friend of the youth chosen to guess correctly, slips down to where he is sitting and whispers to him to try, for example, Aimaltua. The youth timidly does so, and at once X begins to shake violently, and calls frantically:

"More! More!"

*575 In Kimsquit, though not in Bella Coola, the long drawn-*796 out whistling of Snitsmän·a is heard, though of course the un-184 initiated do not know that four kukusiut have been sent out for this purpose. The excitement becomes intense.

The man who is prompting the successful guesser whispers to him the second answer. The young man calls it out and X becomes more and more excited, shaking wildly and shouting:

"More! More! You mortal."

Finally the third answer is given. In Bella Coola the dancer leaps high in the air from his enclosure and falls to the ground beneath as if dead. Saignäs of Kimsquit, on the other hand, whose patron is the wild Kokoshum, becomes frenzied, breaks his stick and enclosure and acts like a raging, though feeble, lunatic. Irrespective of X's behaviour, the marshals ask the uninitiated to withdraw, and the growling Cannibals add point to the request. It is at this juncture in Bella Coola killed, his reputation would only be increased by the manner of his death. At length Ne-xwankai fired into the air; not until a shower of eagle down was blown forth did anyone realize that his musket had been loaded with nothing more deadly. This marked the establishment of friendly relations.

B T [535] [431]

The Kitkatla had brought their own singers,[1] who now began to beat out time for Tcuhsa to perform a xwaak dance. He was followed by several other chiefs, and then the strangers gave presents to influential Bella Coola on the most lavish scale. Pattu likewise performed a xwaak dance, and bestowed gifts on the guests to validate it; such were, of course, not returnable. A meal was then served, and after that Tcuhsa made a speech of which the gist was that the Bella Coola had previously known his achievements as a warrior, they now knew his nobility and bravery in risking his life, and that the name Tcuhsa could never be forgotten, irrespective of his own fate.

Tcuhsa left soon afterwards. It was somewhat difficult fully to comprehend his motive in thus risking his life. Undoubtedly his main object was to display his valour and disregard of danger. Moreover, it gave him an opportunity to impress these qualities upon the Bella Coola, and thus to exhibit his prowess actually within the enemy's camp, which must have been a source of tremendous gratification to him. The alleged motive, regret at killing a chief, may have been a contributory factor.

Although this visit was an intimation from Tcuhsa that the Bella Coola need have no further fear of him, the suspicions of years could not be immediately allayed; in fact, an occasional skirmish still took place although Tcuhsa himself refrained from fighting. A few years after his visit to Bella Coola, Pattu prepared to give a potlatch to which he determined to invite the northern chief. Many of the Bella Coola doubted whether the Kitkatla warriors would respect the safe-conduct usually afforded to envoys, and no one was anxious to bear the invitation. At length six chiefs volunteered for the task and set out, though with many misgivings. They stopped en route at Bella Bella where a chief of that tribe, Omyu, joined the party; he thought that he would have influence with the Kitkatla and might add protection to the Bella Coola. Fearing to be seen by any small Kitkatla bands, the delegation travelled only by night until they could actually reach Tcuhsa's village. As they paddled up, they indicated their mission by singing one of Pattu's xwaak songs. On hearing this, Tcuhsa asked one of his Bella Coola slaves whose song it might be, and when he answered that it was one of Pattu's, Tcuhsa despatched a chief, Kwinas, to invite the guests to his house. Omyu was thankful when he saw this man approaching, since he felt that it heralded a friendly welcome. The party was conducted to Tcuhsa's dwelling in spite of the fact that a Cannibal dance was taking place there. All the messengers were hamsiut in Bella Coola, while three had Bella Bella rights as well; Tsuhua allowed the latter to take part in the ceremony while the former were treated as uninitiated. They were greatly interested in the details of the Kitkatla rites, which were exceedingly strict and included the eating of a corpse. At the conclusion, the envoys received their share of the small presents which were distributed.

At this juncture one of the envoys, Xemxemálala, fell seriously ill and was cured only through the attention and care of one of Tsuhua's wives. This delayed their departure so that it was a long time before they and the invited guests finally set out, much to the envy of two Bella Coola slaves who greatly desired to return home.

Meanwhile the long absence of the messengers had filled the Bella Coola with fear that they had been massacred, and there was great rejoicing when a large flotilla was seen approaching. The guests landed on the shore at Xempo-ts where the customary ceremonious greetings were exchanged. Many of the Bella Coola, inflamed by ancient wrongs, endeavoured to break the canoes of the guests and in other ways to threaten them, but Putlu finally succeeded in restraining them and establishing some kind of discipline. The ceremony that took place that night in the house of Putlu is said to have been the most spectacular ever witnessed in Bella Coola. One old man who, as a mere lad, had attended, grew eloquent as he spoke of the lavish display. Unfortunately, he had had no part in the rites and could remember none of the details except that his childish mind was amazed at a dance in which a masked performer, representing a whale, vomited grease on the fire to give light. Tsuhua did not return home immediately, but remained in Bella Coola until spring when the weather was more suitable for travelling.

This exchange of hospitality virtually ended all hostility, although the Bella Coola and other tribes of the central coast still regard their northern neighbours with dislike and suspicion. Between 1880 and 1890 a party of Rivers Inlet people went to Kitlope to prepare olachen grease, for which purpose a number of Kitkatla had also camped there. Among them was Tsuhua, a descendant of the warrior chief whose exploits have been recounted, and his nephew. One day the latter was gambling with Afatsu-a, a Rivers Inlet youth who had recently been initiated into the hamsiut society and was consequently decorated with a cedar-bark collar. Afatsu-a's luck was amazing and some of the Kitkatla's friends asked him why he continued to play with a man who was clearly in such close contact with the supernatural that he could not lose. Heedless of this advice, Tsuhua's nephew continued until finally, losing his temper, he

the neighbouring Carriers, but Chilkotin as well sometimes descended to the valley. On the coast, though the dense underbrush prevented travel along the shore, the long fiords, sheltered from the open Pacific, were ideal for the use of canoes.[16] Comparatively lengthy journeys were neither difficult nor uncommon. The Tăl-is people were usually on amicable terms with the inhabitants of Rivers Inlet, and the Kimsquit with the Kitlobe. The Bella Coola were accustomed to attend potlatches at Alert Bay and Fort Rupert,[17] Knight's Inlet, and Butc Inlet, receiving their hosts, in turn, at Bella Coola. On the other hand, there was little friendly intercourse with the northern tribes, of which the Kitkatla especially were dreaded by the residents of the central coast. Until recent years the Bella Coola had no direct knowledge of other Salish-speaking peoples, although some of the Chilkotin told them of a tribe living far to the south, in the interior, whom they encountered in some of their wanderings and used to term Nuxălkuy, recognizing the similarity between their language and that of the Bella Coola. A few years ago several Bella Coola attended a boarding-school and were amazed to find that many of their words were understood by fellow-students from Chilliwack.

To sum up: The Bella Coola were in close contact with the neighbouring coastal tribes, with the members of which they felt themselves to have cultural affinities. They recognize that they have received many ceremonial rites from their neighbours, and must have adopted other elements of culture which they now consider indigenous. It is probable that certain Bella Coola customs must likewise have been transmitted to other tribes, but such lie without the scope of this monograph. The outlying villages were in close contact with foreign neighbours, and tended to assimilate elements of their culture, but, on the whole, the Bella Coola present a tribal unity with distinctive local customs, falling within the general pattern of coastal culture.

423 is no doubt that a man tends to lose those rights in property
614 which are strictly his, if they are located at a distance. Thus several men claim that they are legally entitled to hunt at Kitlobe, but from mere difficulty of access neither they nor their fathers have exercised the right, and it would have been lost in the course of a few generations, even without the utter decay of custom which has followed the advent of the white man. Practically, a man hunts only in the grounds of those ancestral families in whose origin myths he has names, though, theoretically, he is entitled to hunt on any hunting-ground of any ancestral family of which he is a member whether or not he holds a duly validated name from its origin myth. It is not necessary to confirm the right to property as with a name, though a validated ancestral name is the usual mark of a man's right to that area of the ancestral family to which that designation belongs. Although the ownership of land in distant regions is of little practical importance, it is, none the less, a [554] matter of great pride to a man to feel that he has rights in many places. The efforts of an individual to make good those [721] claims has often led to bloodshed; in fact, one intelligent old man stated that property disputes were the principal cause for [554] war in British Columbia. A person who lacks hunting-grounds is little better than a slave, whereas one who has much land is important.

The Bella Coola regard land as almost inalienable. Though a man does not own the land of his wife's ancestral family, he can use it and his children have full rights to it. Conversely, a wife can gather berries on her husband's land, though it is not hers. A guest at a village may be allowed to use the [574] territory of his hosts, but it does not become his. In the old
727 days wars between the coastal tribes were common, but though slaves were taken freely, land was never seized; such is un-
423 thinkable to a Bella Coola. In fact, several of the older people [567] inquired how it had been possible, in the first world war, for the allies, whose cause they believed to be righteous, to annex territory from Germany. If the victors had killed or enslaved

171 lieved that all the Kitkatla chiefs were powerful, but Tcubsia
556 was the greatest of all. It is said that one of his prerogatives[1]
622 was to exercise jus primae noctis whenever a Kitkatla was 829 married. Without question, tales of this chief's prowess have become exaggerated in transmission, none the less they show that the Bella Coola realize the great importance of the northern chiefs. Concerning their nearer neighbours, the Bella Bella, the Bella Coola understand the way in which the members of a family combine to help their chief in the giving of presents. They say that the Bella Bella consider the Bella Coola practice of each one endeavouring to make himself a chief to be foolish in the extreme. Such is also said to be the opinion among the Kwakiutl, who support their contention that in Bella Coola all are chiefs, from the fact that flooring exists under the seats of all, whereas in Fort Rupert, their home, such occurs only beneath the seats of chiefs.

262 Corresponding to the extreme paucity of functions pos-
574 sessed by Bella Coola chiefs, their prerogatives are likewise
622 scanty. Indeed, they take their validated seats only during certain rites of the secret society connected with chiefs, at potlatches, and at ceremonial meals. These last occur whenever a deer or seal is killed; the latter is considered a great delicacy.[2] Anyone can kill a seal, but it would be unthinkable for a Bella [225] Coola to share its flesh with his immediate family only. The [252] animal is cleaned, the hole made by bullet or spear carefully plugged, and the carcass boiled whole in a large box. Mean-[203] while a herald (I, p. 244) summons the chiefs to the house where the successful hunter lives. If the meal is to consist merely of one small seal, only a few chiefs are invited, those of greatest influence through their possession of "strong" seats. When several seals have been killed, the number invited is corres-
[562] pondingly larger, but no woman may partake unless she ranks

[1] This is said to have been a personal prerogative, not shared by all chiefs, and requiring validation by valuable presents.

[2] Only traces of the rite described in this paragraph occur at the present time. In fact, the reservation of seal meat for chiefs alone was discontinued towards the close of the last century.

as a man by the duly validated ownership of a chief's name in her own right. Formerly a slave was never allowed to eat seal, unless he had been the slayer. If many seals are killed, chiefs from adjacent villages are sometimes invited. The chiefs seat themselves according to their proper positions and are first served with the blood-stained grease that floats to the top of the water as the meat is boiling. When cooked, the meat is cut into strips, measured in terms of so many finger breadths, according to the number of guests. The cuts run down each fore-flipper, so that each receives a narrow strip including one of the toes. The head is always given to the herald.[3]

Wealthy chiefs frequently invite their fellows to ordinary meals even when no seal or deer has been killed. On these occasions, as at seal feasts, the guests are designated by their ancestral names, not by those in general use.

Chiefs are also accustomed to meet for the discussion of matters connected with the winter ceremonial; on such occasions their number may be augmented by men of influence in the secret society, though they do not rank as chiefs. Such a meeting is always called when a new member is to be initiated into the kusiut society. If there is difference of opinion the influence of even a numitl chief is outweighed by a man of importance in the society. The matter is discussed by all present and a decision reached by general agreement. It is difficult for a white man to understand how such is possible without either a vote, or general recognition by all that the views of some individual must be accepted. The writer was present at one such meeting, and was struck by the manner in which, after considerable, and at times heated, discussion, a consensus of opinion was reached, and accepted even by those who had proposed a contrary course.

Near every village is a place where the chiefs hold such meetings. All the inhabitants know the general locality, but monograph the term "potlatch" will be limited to this, the łum. [104]

[3]Every effort was made to ensure the accuracy of this account, but errors may have crept in on account of the length of time which has elapsed since the ceremony was carried out in full detail.

Every Bella Coola is, or should be, able to recount how, in the beginning of time, the supreme god, Ałquntäm, caused his ancestors to be created in his house in the land above, whence they were sent down to populate the earth. A creation legend of this type is a man's most treasured possession.[4] Most myths describe the adventures of these first people, how they prospered in the Bella Coola country until they were able to invite to their homes guests from far and near, to whom they showed what they had achieved, through the assistance of Ałquntäm, or of some other supernatural being. In so doing they were carrying out Ałquntäm's wishes. He told some of these first people that if they accumulated much wealth, in those days chiefly food, there was danger that the provisions first stored would rot, hence they should cut away the bottom of the pile and present it to other men and women. The Bella Coola term for "to cut out that which is rotten" is łłt, hence the origin, according to their belief, of the word łum, which thus has the significance of "a giving away of long accumulated goods which otherwise might rot."

556 * 773 [424] [192]

By the splendour of his gifts each of the first people able to give a potlatch (łum), spread the knowledge of his name and fame to the towns whence his guests had assembled. Further, those who had received dances from Ałquntäm were able to demonstrate them. In course of time those who had first given potlatches died, but on taking their fathers' names, the sons, or other descendants, endeavoured to uphold the parental tradition by inviting guests from afar and giving them valuable presents. At such a ceremony the family history, or family myth, was recounted, so that the donor of a potlatch not only increased his own prestige, he incorporated therewith the traditions of his parent. This is the essence of the potlatch as carried out today.[5]

[4] Examples of these are given in vol. I, chap. vi.

[5] It has been found convenient to use the present tense throughout, although the potlatch is not now carried out in its entirety.

*556 Although guests from different tribes are sometimes invited to other ceremonials, it is at potlatches that they are essential. ●574 Since the validity of such transactions as marriages, divorces, [203] or the assumption of professional prerogatives depends on the presence of witnesses, and since the importance of such a rite depends on the number of witnesses, a man is always eager to carry out any public performance at a potlatch when he is sure of the attention of foreigners, and the consequent wider diffusion of knowledge of what he has done. The man who has invited guests is usually willing to allow others to perform at his potlatch, since it increases the complexity and importance [184] of the affair. It follows that no two potlatches are alike; one will contain features entirely lacking in another. Moreover, the wealth of the donor determines how many rites he himself will cause to be performed. The fundamental concept of the potlatch is the inviting of guests from abroad to witness rites [769] in connection with an ancestral myth, especially the return of a recently deceased relative of the donor to visit the living.

*556 At any important potlatch the following rites are carried out, and in the account of the ritual it will be assumed that 796 these alone are taking place. If the reader bears this summary in mind, he is less likely to be confused by the complication of rites.

(1) The return of a dead ancestor to visit the living.

[575] (2) The initiation of young men or women into the susaok society. This includes the validation of a susaok name for each, [553] and a period of seclusion in the back-room. The initiates may either be relatives of the donor of the potlatch, or young persons whose relatives are taking the opportunity to carry out the rite in the presence of foreigners. Some of the initiates may already be members of the society, undergoing a further period of seclusion in order to increase their status by a further distribution of presents.

[554] (3) The payment by the wife of the donor and her family [858] of goods to "rebuy" her from her husband. This is a legal fiction, though necessary to maintain the status of the children. [583]

535 The reception of this power from his Bella Coola confrère
* 556 enables the guest siki to dance at X's potlatch, if he so desires.
In that case the guests are guided to X's house without further 575 delay. If, however, he does not wish to dance, he goes through the motions of throwing something back to the Bella Coola siki, who pretends to catch it. He bends down, twists himself about, then throws back his cape—to display there the representation of Mulakila. At the time of throwing, the visiting siki had slipped his mask out of sight, so that those witnessing the transaction, ignorant of the fact that the recipient has had an identical mask hidden beneath his cape throughout, are suitably impressed. He now revolves four times, while an assistant, sheltered under a large cloak, sounds the whistle constantly. Then the siki makes the motion of throwing something to X's house, and after that the whistle sounds from within, while the man who had been blowing one beside the siki ceases. Thus the uninitiated are led to believe that the voice can proceed only from the place where the power over which the siki has control is situated.

* 556 The guests are conducted to X's house, to which a number of young men carry their goods. A meal of toasted salmon, ● 574 provided by X, is served to them by a number of youths, all of whom are eager to undertake this task throughout the ceremony. A section of the house is allotted to each party of guests, and within that space they arrange themselves according to convenience. Some informants state that the first group to arrive is seated nearest the fire. The whole of those invited are not placed according to rank. The amount of space allotted to each party of guests depends upon their number, and there is no particular choice made of a section in the house. X, or more often some one who speaks for him, welcomes the guests, and a spokesman from among them makes a suitable reply, usually with the assistance of an interpreter. After the meal, the guests can remain where they are or go out. As many as wish to do so stay in X's house, but many prefer to go to the homes of their friends in the village; it is a matter of convenience, not of ritual. 556* [574]

In the evening, there may be no rite of any kind, but X often invites everyone to his house for the performance of non-ceremonial dances. The singers strike up one of his susaok or a'alk (I, p. 273) tunes and he dances to it. Then a tune belonging to one of his relatives is beaten out, and he too dances. After several have thus performed, a meal is served and all disperse. No supernatural beings are in attendance, hence there is no solemnity to the occasion; the evening's rites merely serve to show the guests the dances owned by their host and his family. 535 556*

As each party of guests arrives the same procedure is repeated. X provides food for those who have assembled from day to day, so he anxiously awaits the last-comers. When at last they come the guests from all other towns are in their allotted sections of X's house, and are free to make gibes at the tardiness of those latest in appearing. Occasionally, hard feelings are engendered in this way, although it is an established custom to mock at the last to arrive. They seat themselves and a small amount of food is given them. 556* 574 [628]

RITUAL CARRIED OUT BY THE GUESTS

Two youths, chosen by X for the purpose, sprinkle eagle down over the heads of all those present, as far as possible blowing it first over the chiefs. It serves as a token of good-will, and marks also the ceremonial nature of the occasion. Then a leading susaok, perhaps a siki, stands up and says in effect: 556* [788] [237] [575]

"Thank you for coming. You are welcome. We thank you for coming to witness what X has done. He is delighted to have you here, because he has lost many of his relatives and wishes to perpetuate their memory. They would be grieved if he did not do so."

An elaborate meal is now served by a number of young men. [264]

* 556 the best songs they have made for the initiates, and any of the sisaok members of the audience desiring to "help" the initiates
575 dance to them, even X himself on occasion. By "help" no [535] material aid is indicated; such dancing merely displays a friendly and sympathetic interest. The initiates, resplendent in sisaok head-dresses, appear at the door of the back-room, and sometimes dance a few steps. Occasionally, at the conclusion of his song, a lad's parents, or other relatives, bring forward the goods which will be later distributed by X to the guests. On other occasions, this is reserved for the following day. Food is distributed and all disperse.

THE POTLATCH: SECOND DAY

On this, one of the two most important days of the whole ceremony, the following rites take place.

During the Day

(1) Communication to the foreign guests of the new sisaok
[553] names of the initiates concealed within the back-room; these names are the ones that have been made known to the Bella Coola before the potlatch proper.

(2) Payment to X by the members of his wife's family of the goods necessary to rebuy her from her husband.

During the Evening

(3) Repayment by X of debts owed to members of his own village.

(4) Return of a dead relative of X to visit the living.

(5) Distribution of presents to validate this appearance.

(6) In some cases, dancing by some of the sisaok initiates.

[575] Early in the morning X gives each of his guests a wash-
[574] basin with the other necessary appurtenances for cleaning up, and towards noon all of those invited reassemble in his house. Three river canoes have been brought in and are ranged, two parallel to the side walls, and one parallel to the back wall, all far enough out to permit people to sit behind them. CHAPTER V

FEATURES ASSOCIATED WITH THE POTLATCH

Heralds—Totem-Poles—Coppers—Professional Prerogatives—A'alk Dances—Miscellaneous Ceremonies

128 *556 THE ritual of the potlatch is so complicated that, in order to present a coherent account of it, it has been necessary to omit entirely some features that occur at many potlatches, and to refer briefly to others. This chapter is devoted to an elaboration of these points, thus avoiding the use of lengthy foot-notes in the preceding chapter.

HERALDS

203 *556 The principal functions of heralds[1] have already been described. They go from house to house inviting the people to assemble for the different ceremonies connected with the potlatch, but that is only one of their many duties. They likewise bear invitations to all types of ceremonies, such as marriages, mourning rites, or kusiut dances; in fact, they act as town criers. A person holding any public rite requests one or more heralds to deliver the invitation which is repeated in every house of the village in order from bottom to top.[2]

There are variations, of course, according to the rites to be performed. At a potlatch, the first duty of a herald is to seat [574 628 578] the guests in their proper places. This requires not only a good memory, but also considerable tact, since errors with foreign guests cause friction and embarrassment, and diminish the prestige of the whole ceremony. During the actual progress of the rites, a herald must constantly add dignity to the occa-

[1]Herald, *a'lk*ʷ, plural, *waalk*ʷ*at*, not to be confused with a'alk, the name of a society (I, p. 273).

[2]This order may once have had a ceremonial significance but it has been considered for a long time merely a matter of convenience. When giving presents also, a man follows the same order in his mind and names first the occupants of the bottom house, thus minimizing the danger of overlooking a guest.

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

556 or three rounds he retires utterly exhausted. The time beaten 575 out for a nusqwal or am'lel·a dancer is the same. He too comes 535 near the fire and at first dances in the same manner until the [533] singers in unison bellow out, Wai··, "More." With a run that ends in a crashing leap that seems to shake the floor, the performer takes his position between the fire and one of the side walls and begins to revolve furiously upon himself. His body is bent forward until it seems as if all that prevents him from falling to the floor is his hands clutched together as far as possible behind his back; while his feet move so rapidly that the short mincing steps run into each other. Gradually the beating becomes less violent, only to be followed by another cry of Wai··, and another rush and jump that lands the dancer behind the fire. Here he revolves once more in the same furious fashion; the same is repeated on the side of the fire opposite to the place where he first performed, and finally between the fire and the door. Nusqwal and am'lel·a are the most strenuous of all Bella Coola dances and the performer is glad to retire. He afterwards joins the audience. This dance entails no taboo or restrictions on the dancer.

This terminates the performance of this type of dance at a potlatch, but among the goods distributed are some to validate the name acquired by the dancer, and others to legalize his actual display.

● 574 The occasion on which importance and solemnity are 575 attached to a'alk dances is during potlatches, but they are
[796] end of the kusiut season and before the salmon come to the rivers, dances for pleasure are of common occurrence. A sisaok can call his fellows to his house and the singers beat out sisaok songs to which the owners dance, but the most common hosts are a'alk. Of course an individual may be a member of both societies, but the heralds invite the guests in his a'alk name. Those summoned include both members of the society and those who are not. Any a'alk, provided that he has enough food for a meal, can call in his neighbours, but the one who usually does so is a man who has received his name a year or two before the occasion. 574 575 535

1: McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

A few days before the time selected, the host asks the singers to compose a new song for him. For a nusqwal dancer particularly, and in some cases for any one of the other three divisions of the society, the text does not deal with incidents connected with the host's ancestral story, but with humorous or disgraceful incidents of the present time. If a man has caught ten salmon and kept them all for himself, his miserliness is commented upon in the song; if a wife has deserted her husband for another man, the actions of the two are mercilessly ridiculed; if a chief has failed to display generosity it is likewise recorded, and reference is made to errors in dance ritual. To do this is one of the functions of a nusqwal, and the singers are always ready to assist him. At the same time they often add a new incident to the tune belonging to some other a'alk dancer so that he too will be able to perform. In this way the airs are remembered from year to year, which is different from the customary Bella Coola usage. 575 574 535 533 [626]

On the morning of the day chosen, the host asks one of the singers to beat a drum repeatedly but slowly, as a signal that a non-ceremonial dance is about to take place. About noon, heralds go from house to house announcing who is to give the dance. In the late afternoon the people gather in the donor's house where men, women, and children seat themselves without distinction of rank, the only reserved place being that for the singers behind the fire. They beat out the host's tune and he dances to it, while the singers themselves sing the words to the amusement of the audience. Using their own discretion, they then beat out the tune of another a'alk and he also dances, followed in succession by a third, a fourth, and as many as the singers think fit. Sometimes the songs of susaok are used in a similar manner. When many have danced, the host distributes food to all his guests, not forgetting to give the largest [202] [203]

presents to the singers and heralds who have rendered assistance. Instead of dispersing immediately, the guests may remain to gamble or wrestle. Since there is no solemnity attached to the affair, it is a time for indulgence in amusements of all kinds. These conclude the chief features of the a'alk dances. Probably they once played an important part in the lives of the Bella Coola, but with the increase in importance of the sisaok, they have decayed into little more than a form of entertainment.

A'alk ORIGIN MYTHS

551 575 773

Theoretically, every Bella Coola a'alk should be able to record the myth in which his name is embodied, but few can do so. Of course if a man has been able to validate both ancestral and a'alk names from the same myth, that is his authorization for both. In many cases a myth is split, and the portion containing an a'alk appellation is given to some member of the ancestral family, other than the chief able to validate the most important ancestral name. In such a case, the a'alk can record little more than that his designation came down with a specified group of the first people. This, for example, is the explanation given by a Kimsquit nusqwal for his name Sinxälotla which came to earth with Smaoan (I, p. 332) in the beginning of time. Another Kimsquit a'alk, Tlaiyäkam, whose prerogative is to perform the dance of that name, states that it was brought down by Sinuxetl (I, p. 326), who assumed the designation of Tlaiyäkam after its performance. This early settler had the additional name of Wi'tälao.

539

The two following origin myths were obtained in some detail:

Once,[9] long, long ago, Äiqunäm came to the conclusion that it was not good for the inhabitants of the world to be afraid of supernatural beings. He decided that the best way to dispel this dread would be to arrange a marriage between his daughter, Sinxan·a, and a mortal; so he

556 performance of rites of this kind. But sociological and ethical [182] concepts, shown at their highest development in the potlatch, are not limited to a few weeks of the year, or to any class of the community. Generosity on a large scale can be publicly
[577] displayed by chiefs alone, but to a lesser degree this virtue must be practised by everyone, since avarice is considered a 576 major sin. Anyone who happens to pass a house in which a meal is taking place must be invited to share it; to do other-
574 wise would be considered rude. The person summoned must take at least a trifle to show that he is not churlish and too proud to eat with his host, while if he is hungry, he shares [177] whatever is being served as a matter of course. The head of the family should be the first to taste any wine[14] as proof that
[273] it is not poisoned, but otherwise he fares little, if any, better
[342] than his guests. This custom is now rapidly falling into disuse through the construction of individual family houses with doors [414] and locks. The fisherman who has exclusive rights to a suitable place for netting olachen or salmon must give some of his 476 catch to anyone who asks him. If he has landed four salmon,
[226] the first solicitor is given one, later comers, none at all. When a net is set in the river, anyone passing is allowed to raise it and take some of the contents; if there are two fish, he may remove one, if many, three or four. To take all would be a
[685] despicable theft, sufficient to brand the transgressor as greedy;
[626] hence public opinion prevents the system from being carried to excess. A hunter who brings back several mountain goats
[224] or other large game is expected to invite his neighbours to a feast, which virtually means that he must share his takings.

556 Presents of this kind increase the prestige of the donor who 431 has thus acted in accordance with Bella Coola ethics, and are advantageous investments since others must reciprocate. The system is carried to such lengths that, until recent years, it was more profitable to give away goods than to sell them. In the case of a sale, the purchaser endeavours to give as little as possible, whereas the recipient of a gift returns as much as he can. Several of the older people mentioned that early white traders would have received more for their goods by giving them away than by selling. 556 431

Even at the present time the Bella Coola sometimes carry out a practice which was once common. Particularly in the early autumn or in spring, a chief who has large supplies of food may decide to show his wealth to the members of a neighbouring tribe such as the Bella Bella. Alone, or with a few friends, he goes to a foreign village where he is sure to find accommodation in the home of some friend, relative, or important chief. In the evening he invites the inhabitants of his host's village to the house in which he is staying, and uses the food he has brought with him to provide them with an elaborate meal. His guests now feel it incumbent on them to repay this generosity, and one of them asks the singers to beat out one of his songs, the Bella Bella equivalent to sisaok, a'alk, or even kusiut. The owner dances to it and then gives presents to the stranger to validate the performance he has just witnessed. This is repeated by everyone to whom he has given food, and although each present may be small, their total is greater than the original outlay. Sometimes a poor man, feeling himself too insignificant to give a ceremony of this kind, takes a supply of food to a foreign tribe to sell. If the hosts wish to show their generous dispositions they persuade him to give it away in the fashion just described, which always brings in more than he could obtain by sale. It is even customary for the hosts to lend such a stranger enough food for public distribution if his own stock is too small. 556 648 [484]

Although the most important Bella Coola dances are performed at potlatches or during the kusiut season, they are not confined to these periods. Professional singers do nothing else and, except during the run of salmon when everyone is busy fishing, a dance occurs every few nights. Supernatural beings are not called down; consequently there is little solemnity and everyone has a good time. On these occasions, kusiut songs are first beaten out, followed by sisaok and a'alk, and the owner 533 535 574

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

533 of each song dances to it. Anyone who has enough food to 535 provide a meal for all is glad to invite his neighbours to such an affair, but the singers and heralds can force a stingy man ●574 to act as host. Everyone knows his neighbour's resources and the singers have no hesitation in going to the house of a man with an ample supply of food and beginning to beat out songs [203] there. The heralds are quick to see what is happening and [626] call the people, with the result that the involuntary host is compelled to provide a meal in order not to be thought mean and churlish. Without waiting for the singers to take the [203] initiative, heralds likewise often invite people to the house of a man whom they know to be well provided with food.

During the summer, the necessity of laying in supplies of [221] salmon makes it impossible to hold many dances, although one [796] of the non-sacred type just described takes place whenever there is a lull in the fishing. In the early autumn, when ber-556 ries, fish, and game are abundant, the thoughts of chiefs turn 796 to potlatches and the lengthy preliminaries are begun. At this season, too, a chief who lacks sufficient wealth to invite foreign [221] guests, calls in his neighbours for a susaok dance and initiates 575 some of his young relatives into that society. The ritual, described in the last chapter, resembles that of a potlatch [535] except that no new house is constructed, there is no return of a dead relative, and the ceremonial connected with the coming of foreigners is necessarily omitted. In some cases a chief performs this type of rite a year before he proposes to hold a potlatch, and explains that he is doing so because he will be unable to give presents to the inhabitants of his own village [426] at the later affair. Gifts so distributed are returnable with interest, though it is not obligatory for recipients to do this in time for the donor to make use of their repayment at his potlatch.

Ceremonials of this nature occupy the Bella Coola during [575] the early autumn, while in winter kusiut dances take place [535] almost nightly. When they are over, it is time for the non-sacred variety of a'alk performances, and for another type of rite, nusäxkämx.

* 539 * 787 sons, of whom the eldest was about sixteen, though old enough to appreciate the slights put upon their father, could do nothing to defend him.

[556] On a winter day one of these lads felt impelled to follow a trail down the north side of the Bella Coola valley along the edge of salt water. The weather had been cold for some time, but on this day it was so warm that he lay down to doze on the warm rocks. Near his head was a small opening which connected with a long passage to the ocean, and through this he presently heard the hoarse breathing of sleeping seals. His hunting desires aroused, he went to the edge of the steep crag overlooking the sea and dived in. He bravely penetrated into a narrow passage which led him under the rocks, until with his last gasp he emerged into a cave where there were countless seals. Waiting only a moment, and without disturbing the animals, he dived back through the passage safely.

[411] When he reached home the lad said nothing about what he had seen, but that evening he began to make a seal-spear of the usual type with a wooden handle and a bone point. He asked his father to help him with this carpentry task, and his mother to make a rope for the harpoon-head. Though surprised at their son's energy, the parents did as he requested, but the fellow-villagers mocked at his efforts, for the lad was no hunter.

Next morning he asked his father to accompany him, and the two set off in a canoe, carrying the spear which had been made the previous evening. Before starting, the lad requested one of his brothers to have a fire ready for cooking the spoil that night. Father and son paddled to the entrance of the subterranean passage, though the old man was, of course, ignorant of its existence. The son told him to wait, and dived overboard, armed only with a club, for the seal-spear had really been unnecessary. He penetrated through the passage and at once killed a seal pup, born that year, with which he returned to the canoe. The lad explained nothing to his father, so that it seemed to the latter as if his son had dived down into the depths and there slain a seal, after remaining below for an amazingly long time.

When the two returned to the village they were greeted with a shriek of laughter at the small size of their quarry. In derision, the villagers took the pup from them and threw it from hand to hand, as if it had been a ball.

[224] [225] [574] [556] As already described, it is customary whenever a man kills a deer, a mountain goat, several seals, or any other large game, for him to invite his fellows to a feast. The number of guests depends on the size of the quarry, but in all cases the chiefs are the first to be invited and anyone who fails to do so is laughed at for his stinginess. On this occasion the seal-pup was obviously so small that any general invitation to partake of it was ludicrous. Nevertheless, the lad sent a herald to invite not only

224 hanging rock where no rain can penetrate. Long ago, some [732] hunter failed to do this and became blind in consequence, hence the rite has since been carried out.

When a hunter is in the field, his wife must not swing. To do this causes him to go up into lofty and dangerous places as she rises on the swing, and also destroys the power laboriously accumulated by ceremonial chastity.

Ritual Acts

796 Ceremonialism is an extremely important aspect of Bella
226 Coola life, but most of their rites are social or religious rather than magical, so that descriptions of them belong to other 789 chapters. In connection with the taking of the first olachen and salmon, however, a number of ritual acts are performed to bring about desired ends; the element of propitiation is not entirely absent, but on the whole they may be considered as magical.

Rites connected with the first olachen

226 At the height of the olachen run, the fish are so abundant
796 that they can be taken profitably in large purse-nets. They do not, however, come simultaneously, and eager fishermen 574 keep watching for their arrival and catching the straggling forerunners in hand dip-nets. These fish must not be eaten immediately. Each fisherman arranges a box in the front part of his house in which he deposits them as taken; if several men are doing this in a single dwelling, one box for each will be arranged near the front-door. Whenever a dance is held, eagle down is blown over the receptacle to placate the olachen and prevent them from being disturbed by the noise. As soon as a man has caught enough for a feast, he invites all his fellows to his house and the fish are distributed. It is taboo for any woman to share this meal, and it is most improper for a man to summon his neighbours until he has enough olachen to allow each guest to carry home a plentiful supply for his family. In former times, there used to be a number of meals of this kind,

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948

619 others. This differentiated them clearly from all neighbouring [199] tribes.

B. Ceremonial. A member of a secret society in any of [575] the above towns was accepted as a member in any other one.
[609] A person of another tribe, even if known to belong to a comparable society, was treated as an uninitiated person.

C. Origin and Religion. The people of Bella Coola, Tal-ío, and Kimsquit felt themselves to be akin through acceptance of the fact that their ancestors had been created together in the beginning of time. This marked them off with [771] great clearness from all other tribes, especially from the Carriers of the interior. This belief formed a sentimental and religious bond of great strength.

Neighbouring Tribes

648 It is desirable to describe, briefly, the tribes with which the Bella Coola came in contact.

THE CARRIERS

East of Bella Coola, amid the mountains of the interior, roved the Carriers. In summer they often came down to the river valley to fish or trade for salmon, and in winter they were sometimes forced by cold and starvation again to visit the Bella Coola, Bella Bella, or Rivers Inlet people. There was a [563] good deal of intermarriage between them and the inhabitants of the upper valley, so that the wanderers were able to spend the cold months with relatives. None the less, the Bella Coola
[180] considered these people utterly foreign in habits and beliefs,
[578] and to call a man a "Carrier" was, and still is, a deadly insult. The Carriers lacked the rich ceremonial life of the coastal peoples who, therefore, regarded them with scorn and con-
[794] tempt. The presence of a few of the much-despised Carriers was, however, almost necessary to the correct performance of the winter dances since they were uninitiated spectators whom it was necessary to impress and delude.

from the moon and stated that there were mountains and snow on it. It is commonly stated that the marks on the moon represent a man carrying a bucket. 821 [756]

The stars figure but slightly either in Bella Coola mythology or thought; it is not even known who made them. Two in the Great Bear constellation are called respectively Tpikste and Xinpines, "Little Girls." A lone star in the same part of the sky, named A'lox, is said to be following the girls to the forest for illicit intercourse. [773]

Moon, stars, and above all the sun, were, and still are to a certain extent, used by the Bella Coola in computing the passage of time. There are no individuals with the definite prerogative of keeping count of time, but formerly wise old men used to do so.[4] Differences of opinion were the rule rather than the exception, a condition which often led to bitter disputes concerning the proper date for starting the winter ceremonials. Boas (p. 41) has recorded the Bella Coola calendar in greater detail than the present writer has been able to do. The making of calendrical observations is a lost art, and the following list of the months was all that could be learnt. It will be noted that these agree with Boas in regard to the months in the early part of the year, but not in those between the summer and winter solstices; no explanation is offered for this disparity. 805 821 [554] [578] [796] [114] [178] [114]

First moon after the summer solstice: Sikālamtak, which has the significance, "The Time for Sockeye Salmon to Ascend the River."

Second moon after the summer solstice: Sī'islālil, "The Time for Eating Dog Salmon."

Third moon after the summer solstice: Sī'ismal·ōl, "The Time for Eating Cohoe Salmon."

Fourth moon after the summer solstice: Sigālpam, "The Time for Gathering Fern Root," or Sidakas di Ano'lkwalais,

[4] Kimsquit informant stated that there were professional calendrical experts in his home, when he was a young lad although members of the healer society (II, chap. v) sometimes attended to this matter. [575] [463]

*776 tribe are superior to themselves in carpentry, and ascribe their [486] skill to the fact that many of them are descendants of Yalâ-
[648] timut. Some of the coastal tribes are said to believe that Âlqantûm erred in the manufacture of many of the sea mammals, giving them, for example, human heads on fish bodies; he later rectified this by sending his Carpenters to adjust their form. This is not a Bella Coola belief. One elderly man stated that the skill of the Carpenters in painting and modelling was derived from a little girl named Qexhanao; no confirmation could be obtained for this statement and the information was vague and unreliable.

Since their creation of the sky and many features of this world, as well as birds and animals, the Carpenters have entered but little into the lives of the Bella Coola. Like other supernatural beings, they are capable of going anywhere, but for many generations they have not been seen on this earth. Their most important function, perhaps, is to act as patrons [575] for various kusiut dancers. This subject will be described in detail in vol. II, chap. 1; for the moment it is enough to say that many supernatural beings regard members of this semi-sacred society as their protégés, and grant them power to per-[535] form dances. On these occasions masked figures are used to represent the patrons, thus enlightening uninitiated persons as to the appearance and attributes of various supernatural beings.

Among the many residents of Nuxmâ·a are two sons of Âlqantûm, Sâxelipmulâlx Âlqantûm and Sno'olnâx Âlqantûm. The former in particular is dearly loved by his father and is often spoken of as Nuxlxwnuxwâum, "The Cherished One." These two beings take no part in the affairs of mortals except [575] as patrons of kusiut dancers. Like all supernatural beings they are considered to be immortal. Since Âlqantûm has two sons it is to be assumed that he has, or had, a wife. Her name is not generally known, although she is sometimes spoken of as [538] Nuxmâ·aien·a, "The Woman of Nuxmâ·a." There are also many stories describing his amours with human women resulting in semi-supernatural offspring.

* 776 the top. He concluded that this must be the home of the woman. Before the door of her house, wherever it may be, there are miniature totem-poles which open their painted mouths and speak in the voice of the animal or bird portrayed. The writer did not hear that her home was in the land above [114] Nazmît-a, as Boas (p. 28) states. At the present time knowledge of Kāmai-ts is so scanty that failure to confirm the previous observation is not surprising.

One or two passing remarks of elderly informants imply that Kāmai-ts may once have been more important to Bella Coola belief than she is now. One old man, already in his [775] dotage, stated that long ago the dead used to dwell in her [782] house. Another declared that long ago prayers were addressed to her, which is never done now. The word kāmai-ts is com- [192] monly used by the Bella Coola in a manner difficult to translate. It serves as equivalent for "please" or "thank you," but has an underlying significance of a supernatural benison or appeal. It is not a word to be used in casual conversation; it is reserved for important occasions or times of emotional stress. The comparative unimportance of Kāmai-ts probably rests on the fact that she belongs merely to the realm of ancient history and has no sociological significance, even as the patron of a kusiut dancer.

772 Another supernatural being so far removed from this world
* 776 that he enters but little into the lives of the Bella Coola, is Swinia. He is the male being whom Ālqustēm sent down from above in the beginning of time to hold the earth in position, and who has since performed this duty. He lives among the ice of the far north, and has not been seen by mortals for many generations. He holds a rope fastened to the earth; when he is afraid that it has slipped slightly he takes a new grip and pulls the rope taut, pressing the world against the soles of his feet as he sits with legs extended, as a man would do to hold tight a kicking salmon. It is the tightening of the rope which [823] causes an earthquake. If Swinia should lose his grip entirely ● 575 the earth would capsize. He is patron for several kusiut
* 776 dancers.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948

* 776 is in the upper Bella Coola valley near Firvale, cause cold 773 breezes by blowing them through their anuses. uxlexman·i es-[821] pecially is a prominent figure in mythology (I, p. 670), but she has not appeared for many generations and her actions belong to legend rather than to either religion or social practices. It is said that she has four sons who once wanted to break a large number of grass stalks. Finding it difficult to do so on account of their toughness, they asked their mother to freeze them; she did this and destroyed every other plant at the same time.

* 776 Another anthropomorphic being is Sxk'lätl, the super-821 natural South Wind of winter who brings storm and snow.
177 The Carriers affirm that every icicle which grows down until [731] its end is in the snow is his walking-stick, and that to break one causes famine. Some Bella Coola have adopted this belief and carefully refrain from destroying such icicles.

* 776 Supernatural beings experience the same difficulty as mortals in reckoning the passage of time. A number of calendrical experts live in the land above, whose duty it is to record both months and years. They are called Älmnskällwaiyaix or [575] Älmnskitlnm. They have been seen occasionally, and are shown, as masked figures, at ts'aok (I, p. 180), but not at kusiut dances. Two of these beings always appear, and they argue about their observations after the fashion of humans.

Another denizen of Nusmät·a of slight importance in the social life of the Bella Coola is Xemxemälotla, a friend and [575] associate of Älquntäm. He acts as patron of kusiut dancers, and in this manner is brought to the notice of mortals. In the land above his function is to cherish Tläqmä·ks, a being resembling a diminutive man, created by Älquntäm as a child to all supernatural beings. Xemxemälotla is its guardian or nurse; and for safety he usually keeps his charge in the far distant upper land above Nusmät·a, where Älquntäm frequently visits the two. In some mysterious manner, Tläqmä·ks has been [777] known to reach this earth, giving good fortune to the lucky finder. He is in many cases spoken of as "The Cherished

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

838 woman who dressed as a man and used to hunt successfully,
[171] though she was married. Such practices are said to have been not uncommon among the Haida. The women were considered bold and independent, but the Bella Coola of today know little *[776] about them, and are not even certain that Sxants is responsible for a female assuming the actions of a male. It will be readily understood that he is not regarded with much awe, nor does he influence their daily lives.

*776 Another supernatural being, uninfluential though resident [822] upon earth, is Echo, Setsaläni, "The Voice Repeater." The Bella Coola regard him as a male being, in human form, and recognize his presence whenever sounds reverberate. He figures in mythology, occasionally appears as a masked figure at ●[575] kusiut or sisaok dances, but has neither helped nor harmed human beings for so many generations that he is accordingly neglected.

*776 A supernatural being from whom many Bella Coola have 787 had unpleasant visitations is Slhmsila, the cause of nightmares.
828 He is a man-like creature with black face and an enormous head which he constantly scratches. His home is in Nusmät·a, but he frequently descends to this world and frightens sleepers. If a person scratches his head while asleep it is because he has just seen Slhmsila doing so, and if he walks in his sleep it is to escape this supernatural visitor. A sleep-walker is usually aroused by having a bucket of water thrown over him. A [751] person frequently troubled by Slhmsila can avoid him by painting a black circle around each eye before going to sleep.

*776 With the exception of Alquntäm, the supernatural beings thus far described play little part in the lives of the Bella Coola. They believe in their existence, but do not expect to meet them, and do not believe that they exercise much influence on the course of their daily life. Supernatural beings of this ineffective 781 type are exceptional. A man goes into remote parts of the mountains, or even into little frequented areas around his *776 village, with mingled fear lest he encounter an actively malicious being, and hope that he may meet a benevolent one. More-

including the dreaded point, Mesatche Nose, in human form. As each came in, water swirled in and the canoe was tossed as if in a whirlpool; if it had capsized the occupants would have been devoured, but on each occasion one of the hunters threw a morsel of false hellebore on the surface, which stilled the waves. At last Ḷomoqwa and his friends admitted defeat, granted the four fishermen the powers of shamans, and gave them certain prerogatives. 539 776*

Though Ḷomoqwa is usually unkind to mortals, and is correspondingly feared, instances are known in which he has bestowed shamanistic powers for no apparent reason. The Bella Coola say that the Bella Bella know more about Ḷomoqwa than they do, since he is essentially an ocean being and the Bella Bella are ocean people. It is possible that the Bella Coola concepts of this supernatural personage are entirely of Bella Bella origin. This supposition is strengthened by the fact that Ḷomoqwa seldom appears in connection with the kusiut society, but frequently with the sisaok society, many of the rites of which came from Bella Bella. [756] 177 776* [575]

Since human beings can travel on the sea only by means of canoes, it is not surprising that the Bella Coola think of supernatural beings as doing likewise. Their beliefs include at least three huge canoes, manned by supernatural beings. The most important is that of Noākxnim,[16] the name of its captain, whose crew consists of a number of supernatural birds and the hermaphrodite. Every year they come from the lands of the salmon and the berries, in the far west beyond the sea, and bear these to the coast of British Columbia. This belief, which runs counter to the conviction that Ālquntām caused the animals and plants to grow, is merely one of the many inconsistencies of Bella Coola theology. Noākxnim comes every autumn on his way to attend the gathering of the supernatural beings in the land above, and his arrival in the Bella Coola River marks the commencement of the kusiut dances. He is one of the most important of kusiut patrons and his powers and functions are described in the chapter devoted to that 773 776* [575]

773 subject. He does not often appear to mankind, though every
* 776 Bella Coola knows of his existence.

Another supernatural craft is that of Winwina.[17] It, too, [575] brings salmon and berries from their home in the extreme west. Knowledge of this canoe is limited to certain families who own stories connected with it, and it likewise serves as patron for kusiut dancers. Although both Noāk̓ɣnum and Winwina can [761] easily destroy human beings, they usually pay no attention to them, and have even been known to bestow supernatural power. Winwina will be described in greater detail in connection with kusiut dances.

The third canoe is termed Winäs di Sä·łłdjo·ts, "The War-Party of the Tide," or Winäs di Q̓ala, "The War-Party of the Ocean." Its home is among small islands in the ocean. It is a large canoe, manned by invisible submarine beings, who are able to drive it at tremendous speed wherever they wish. The members of the crew are not in themselves dangerous, but the craft is greatly feared because it always transports Sxlo·xlˢ. This supernatural creature is about the size of a seal, brown in colour, and of jelly-like substance; it lies in the boat immediately aft of the place from which water is bailed and constantly rolls to and fro, like an animated mass of repulsive jelly. Poison is constantly spreading from Sxlo·xlˢ, and anyone placed in the canoe soon becomes weak, begins to shake like Sxlo·xlˢ, and presently dies. This canoe is a source of danger to those with whom it may come in contact, and an even greater peril indirectly. The poison emanating from 773 Sxlo·xlˢ kills clams and mussels in the vicinity and renders
* 776 them unfit for food. In some cases they die at once, with 825 open shells, and anyone finding them knows what has hap-761 pened and does not eat them, but in other cases they live for a considerable period though saturated with the venom. If [756] anyone eats these shellfish, he becomes flabby and jelly-like, and soon dies, unless a powerful shaman can conquer the
* 776 poison. Sometimes when a party is encamped on the shore

775 walk backwards, or on their heads. Mortals sometimes see ghosts, but the apparition seals their lips so that they cannot [761] recount their experiences. Death invariably follows. Shamans [756] and other mortals endowed with great powers have been able to penetrate to the realm below, and the knowledge of conditions there has been derived from their accounts. Food is scarce in that land and ghosts are often driven up to earth to 264 search for it. Even a small morsel is enough to satisfy their hunger, so that mortals throw fragments on the fire for the 775 benefit of their dead relatives. If a person drop a crumb it is because a ghost has hooked it away from his hand; no wise Bella Coola ever picks up such a morsel, knowing that to do so would offend the hungry spectre. Deceased beings are 775 generally feared, although instances are known in which they have shown kindness, particularly to their relatives. Like so [575] many supernatural beings, they figure most prominently as patrons of kusiut dancers (see vol. II, chap. 1). Further information concerning them is contained in the description of life after death.

* 776 Not even a complete list of beings would exhaust the 177 beliefs of the Bella Coola concerning the supernatural, since any unexpected visitation is attributed by them to this source. For example, when Mackenzie appeared, the first white man with whom the Bella Coola had come in contact, they thought that he must be from another world. Some thought him a dead man returned to life, and others considered him a supernatural visitor from above who had fallen down to earth, as did their first ancestors. The latter view prevailed, and it was ultimately decided that he must be Qomcua, a supernatural being resident aloft of whom little was known. This name was applied to him, and it has since been given to all white men.[18]

[18]Although it was in 1793 that Mackenzie passed down the Bella Coola valley, a number of stories of that event were still remembered in 1922. What most impressed the Bella Coola was his ability to make fire quickly. One man, now living, stated that he had heard from his mother that her father had spoken with him. Traditions of this type are valuable as reflecting the interests of a people, but their historical accuracy may well be doubted. One Kimsquit man, for example,

* 776 and gaping holes in the earth. In such regions no fire can be [778] lit. The last known area of this kind is up the river behind Green Bay, about four miles from the sea. So far as could be learnt, bābink' have never assisted Bella Coola in any way nor played any part in the social life of the community. They are feared on account of their supernatural power, but appear so seldom that they are practically disregarded.

More common than the last, and accordingly more important, is the haohao. It is an enormous bird with bony wings and long, flexible beak. As it flies, the wings rattle violently, and its note, an oft repeated "Hao, hao, hao," can be heard for miles. These birds are said to have been numerous in former [535] years, and are well known to all Bella Coola. Masked figures [575] representing them are often used at kusiut dances. The haohao 761 is feared for its practice of inserting its long beak into the
* 776 rectum of anyone sleeping carelessly in the forest and drawing forth his entrails. This can be prevented by standing upright [789] a staff, such as all hunters carry, before going to sleep.

[539] A popular story states that once, not many years ago, a number of men camped at the edge of a canyon near their home, without taking this precaution. One of them was awakened by a slight movement of one of his companions and, looking up, he saw the long neck and beak of a haohao projecting over the rim of the canyon and sucking his partner's entrails. The convulsive shiver of the stricken man had awakened him. With his bow he shot an arrow into the bird's neck, causing it to disappear over the brink. Presently the long beak reappeared and he discharged another arrow with the same result. Again and again this happened until the attack ceased at dawn. The hunter assumed that a single bird had been repeatedly attacking, but when he looked over the edge of the cliff, he saw below a number of carcasses, each with an arrow in its throat. The canyon must have been a roosting place for the birds. His companions seemed still asleep, but when he investigated he found that all were dead; only the slightly enlarged orifice showed how they had been killed.

* 776 No haohao has been seen within recent years, but one infor-789 mant and her husband heard them on the south side of the Bella Coola River about two miles from the sea. They would have instructed people about the significance of death omens; it was Raven who showed them the use of slings; and it was Raven who constructed secluded caves and ledges to serve as meeting-places for chiefs. 773 [622 823]

In brief, the Bella Coola regard Raven as an explorer, teacher, and inventor, whose power, obtained from Ałquntäm, enabled him to construct and outwit his maker, but not to create. Much of his work was for the good of mankind, but much was evil and malicious, an aspect which belongs to mythology. Essentially human, Raven could have been included among anthropomorphic, as well as among zoomorphic beings. He differs from most of the supernatural ones in belonging entirely to the past, as his descendants have none of the first Raven's power. It is doubtful whether he still exists, but in any case he has long since ceased to take any interest in the affairs of the Bella Coola, who consider him only as a figure of mythology and ancient history. 773 776 [825]

SUPERNATURAL BEINGS OF THE VEGETABLE AND MINERAL KINGDOMS

Bella Coola beliefs concerning anthropomorphic and zoomorphic beings are relatively clear and exact; their appearance is known, their powers and functions recognized. The supernatural attributes of trees and plants are less definite. Ałquntäm created the former in the beginning of time, and they were consequently able to talk and act like human beings at that distant period. Owing to the degeneration of man, mortals are no longer able to converse with trees, although the latter can still understand our remarks. In a vague way, the Bella Coola continue to think of trees as having human personalities, but so little is known of their powers, and they enter so seldom into contact or conflict with mortals, that they are practically ignored. 776 824

In an equally vague manner, Nature is regarded as a Mother, giving birth to the trees and plants. One of the kusiut dances portrays this birth of the flowers every spring (II, p. 196). [535 575]

774 becomes critical. Only a shaman (I, p. 539) can return one, and 755 if he fails death always results. In some cases a spirit leaves [753] its owner without apparent reason; he becomes insane, tries to eat dirt, and his relatives realize at once what is the matter.
[756] They summon a shaman who takes off his cape, hangs it like a pouch on his stick, and points it in all directions as he sings his shaman's song. Finally he locates what is missing, and traps it in his cloak, which he places around the sick man. This restores the element and the sufferer recovers immediately. Another method is for the shaman to press the back of the patient's neck, and by blowing and spitting cause the wandering spirit to return. Either cure must be performed by a shaman because of the supernatural power required.

774 Spirits can be extracted in various ways. Shamans can draw one forth by sucking at the back of the neck between their cupped hands; in former times, some were so powerful that they could extract them by their mere presence. During 774 kusiut dances (II, chap. 1), the uninitiated are told that if they ●575 enter the house where a ceremony is taking place, or even pass
[535] on the sidewalk outside the door, their spirits will be drawn from them by the power within and attracted to the dancer or to the sacred platform on which he is concealed. Many [178] stories are told of this, which were firmly believed by the uninitiated until the last few years. Members of the society claim that their great power acts as a magnet to the spirits of all but their associates, except children in arms; the latter can be taken by their mothers into the house, because their supernatural elements have not developed sufficient strength to 774 leave their bodies. A person may also lose his spirit through a sudden shock. If two people meet unexpectedly in the forest and one of them shouts loudly at the other, even if only in fun, the spasmodic contraction of the muscles is enough to expel it.
[761] The person to whom this happens falls down as if dead, and [756] though he soon recovers, his spirit has left him, and if it is not brought back by a shaman he dies a lingering death.

775 At death, the spirit permanently leaves the body. In some below. These are termed tally posts.[11] Each remained upright as long as the individual to whom it referred was alive, but fell at his death. Since that time, whenever Ałquntām lends to a mortal sininits, the undefined power that causes life, his supernatural artisans erect in the land above a tally post for the new-born infant, marked with the bird or animal used by an ancestor. As long as this remains upright and straight, firmly fixed to the ground, its owner continues to be strong and prosperous, and has success in all his undertakings; if it becomes loose, or is crooked, he ceases to succeed. Prosperity does not depend upon the activities of an individual, but upon his supernatural possessions, spirit, tally post, and a third to be described later. If the tally post tilts far from the perpendicular, its owner becomes ill, and can be cured only by straightening it. In some cases Ałquntām is kind enough to do this if placated by prayer and ceremonial chastity (I, p. 110), and in olden days, shamans were occasionally able to penetrate to the land above for this purpose. Even when a post was reached, they were sometimes unable to set it upright, though they could always estimate the length of a man's life from its angle of inclination. In one of the kusiut dances, the performer pretends to have the ability to go aloft and the uninitiated are deceived by the erection of a tall ladder up which he climbs and disappears (II, p. 202). On his return, he reports the condition of the tally posts of various people. This performance serves to remind both members of the society and uninitiated of the existence of these supernatural elements, and of the dependence of individuals on them for success in life. In spite of this ritual, actual knowledge of the powers and functions of tally posts has been derived only from the first Bella Coola who, created in the land above, were acquainted with the mysteries of life and transmitted such lore to their descendants. One old man expressed the opinion

[11] Łmałłnusta. One of the names of Nusmąt-a, Nusłmałłnaista, refers to these, meaning, "The Place of the Tally Posts." Łmałłnusta and łmałłnusta are closely associated; sometimes the latter is pronounced łmałłnuta, although this may be an error in recording.

Ceremonial chastity is considered almost a necessity to hunters, and in former years a man would rarely, if ever, set out to seek game without fortifying himself by at least several days of continence followed by washing. In the few cases known of a female assuming the clothing and activities of a male, she has been forced to hire a man to sleep with her on the proper nights before starting to hunt. But hunters are by no means the only ones to observe ceremonial chastity. If a man wants to build a salmon-weir, it is by this means that he makes himself strong enough to succeed; if he plays cards, good fortune is sought in the same fashion. The guests at a potlatch observe ceremonial chastity so that their host may not forget them in his distribution of presents, the host, that his guests may arrive on time. The kusiut dancer thus fortifies himself for the performance of a dangerous ritual. In this way a man experiences dreams foretelling the future. In every desire or activity of life, ceremonial chastity is a potent means of success, not infallible, usually combined with prayer and in many cases with sacrifice, but a background and accompaniment to every means of propitiation. If a man has conspicuous ill-luck, it is because he has failed to observe ceremonial chastity; if he succeeds, it is because he has done so. At the present time there is living in the Bella Coola valley an old white man who for years has ranged the mountains in search of gold; he has been unsuccessful, and the Bella Coola believe that he will never succeed until he observes ceremonial chastity.

The strength which a man may acquire through the practice of this rite is almost limitless. A man may be ailing on account of the leaning of his tally post, but, if he energetically and faithfully observes chastity, it will become straightened, whether automatically or through the agency of Ałquntärı is uncertain. After the termination of a long period of continence, a man's spirit is so strong that his friends place their hands on the back of his neck in order to absorb some of the power radiating from his spirit. Ancient myths record how the mere force engendered in a man's body by lengthy abstin-

as a man by the duly validated ownership of a chief's name in her own right. Formerly a slave was never allowed to eat seal, unless he had been the slayer. If many seals are killed, chiefs from adjacent villages are sometimes invited. The chiefs seat themselves according to their proper positions and are first served with the blood-stained grease that floats to the top of the water as the meat is boiling. When cooked, the meat is cut into strips, measured in terms of so many finger breadths, according to the number of guests. The cuts run down each fore-flipper, so that each receives a narrow strip including one of the toes. The head is always given to the herald.[3]

Wealthy chiefs frequently invite their fellows to ordinary meals even when no seal or deer has been killed. On these occasions, as at seal feasts, the guests are designated by their ancestral names, not by those in general use.

Chiefs are also accustomed to meet for the discussion of matters connected with the winter ceremonial; on such occasions their number may be augmented by men of influence in the secret society, though they do not rank as chiefs. Such a meeting is always called when a new member is to be initiated into the kusiut society. If there is difference of opinion the influence of even a numitl chief is outweighed by a man of importance in the society. The matter is discussed by all present and a decision reached by general agreement. It is difficult for a white man to understand how such is possible without either a vote, or general recognition by all that the views of some individual must be accepted. The writer was present at one such meeting, and was struck by the manner in which, after considerable, and at times heated, discussion, a consensus of opinion was reached, and accepted even by those who had proposed a contrary course.

Near every village is a place where the chiefs hold such meetings. All the inhabitants know the general locality, but

[3]Every effort was made to ensure the accuracy of this account, but errors may have crept in on account of the length of time which has elapsed since the ceremony was carried out in full detail.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

622 there is such dread of the supernatural powers possessed by 623 members of the kusiut society that none would dare go there.
778 If an uninitiated person should do so, he would formerly have been either killed or initiated into the society. The meeting-[575] place of the Q̓omqo·ts chiefs is on a ledge of rock jutting out over a waterfall about a quarter of a mile from the village.
The stream winds down a narrow cleft of the mountain side, screened by dense vegetation, and suddenly falls into a cauldron, so hemmed in by cliffs that no sunlight can enter. The ledge is immediately above the brink of the falls, one of the most awe-inspiring places imaginable. The meeting-places of other villages lack such natural settings, though all are at the bases of cliffs, or near some easily distinguished feature. Some 178 of them are decorated with rude carvings, pecked into the 532 stone. The meaning of the designs is not known to any of 778 the present inhabitants. Some of them were made, long ago, by chiefs when they were composing tunes; they picked out the rock in time to the music forming in their minds. Others [211] were mere memorials of certain events. If a chief gave an important ceremony, he, or one of his friends, carved a figure, perhaps that of a man, perhaps of some animal connected with the rite, to recall the occasion. No carvings have been made within the life-time of any Bella Coola, so it is probable that they had further significance, now unknown.

622 When a chief wishes to summon his fellows for a meeting 623 he visits each and notifies him by a simple pressure of the foot, in many cases unobserved even by those sitting near. The 201 person so called slips away, unostentatiously, to the meeting-place.

578 The position of chief was not without disadvantages in the old days. The Bella Coola are so jealous that anyone who 622 succeeded in elevating himself to a position above his fellows 682 became an object of envy. Their mythology contains many [152] examples of the murder of some powerful chief by rivals of his own village, and informants of today state that these records are true. One intelligent man asserted that his father had 184 standardized. Boys and girls helped their parents, and there 476 was no definite age at which they ceased to do so. The fluidity

* 556 of the Bella Coola system was contrary to any standardization. The more important a chief became, the more did he receive from dependent relatives, but the more did they expect in the way of "return presents." It was advantageous to be generous, within the family circle as well as without, since life was so public that every transaction even of a "private" nature, was well known. Unquestionably, a greedy and strong-minded individual must frequently have taken advantage of help from his housemates, but there was no strict code of ethics in regard to this. In brief, it may be said that the acquisition of wealth was an unstandardized, individual, matter; its distribution was likewise according to individual volition, although within a rigidly defined tribal pattern.

Sisaok Society

551 The ancestral names that chiefs desire to raise to a position
* 556 of eminence are usually embodied in myths dealing with the ●575 first settlement of this earth, names which belong, as has been stated, to the ancestral family. Many of these traditions
614 record other designations as well, each of which carries with it [535] the prerogative of performing a type of dance known as sisaok. These will be spoken of, henceforth, as sisaok names. The Bella Coola do not know the meaning of this term. These [553] names, like ancestral ones, are the potential property of members of the ancestral family, but can only be assumed when duly validated by presents. Such an assumption follows a 553 period of seclusion in the back-room of the house. Both men
* 556 and women are eligible. A person may be secluded in this way 575 a number of times, acquiring a new sisaok name on each occa-
[562] sion, but as presents must be distributed every time, it follows that only the children or relatives of wealthy chiefs can be so favoured. It is desirable to have the bestowal of a sisaok name occur at a potlatch, since guests from foreign tribes are then

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

present, and the fame of the initiate is thereby carried farther afield than would be possible if only Bella Coola were in attendance. Every individual duly secluded and given a sisaok name feels himself ceremonially allied to others who have had a similar experience, and they form a grouping which may be termed the sisaok secret society. 553 556* 575

The close connection between this society and chiefs is obvious from the presence of names of each type in the same ancestral myths. None the less, every chief, that is a person with duly validated ancestral name and seat, is not a sisaok, unless he has validated a sisaok name for himself and undergone the period of seclusion. Conversely, a man may be a duly authorized member of the sisaok although lacking a seat and the other marks of chieftainship. The relationship is, however, so close that the Bella Coola think of the sisaok society as a society of chiefs. Sisaok dances take place at potlatches and funerals, and occasionally at gatherings of less importance. Difficulties arise at the death of a chief who has failed to use some of his goods for the acquisition of a sisaok name. Such a case took place at the death of an important Bella Coola in the summer of 1923. Theoretically, he was ignorant of sisaok rites, but after much discussion these were used on account of his importance as a numitl chief, an instance of the manner in which a man's personal importance over-rules ceremonial dictates. 575 622 [553] [535] [766] [183]

The Bella Coola believe that only some of their sisaok name-prerogatives came to this earth at the beginning of time with their first ancestors, and that many more have been acquired later by supernatural experiences. These were especially common among their forbears as they ranged over this earth seeking places to settle in the beginning of time. No sisaok name can be assumed casually; each must have had a specific origin. There are few sisaok origin myths, though theoretically there should be one to account for every name. The explanation appears to lie in the undoubted fact that many sisaok prerogatives have been acquired comparatively recently 424 551 575 773 [177]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

177 from the Bella Bella, a fact emphasized by all. It is not diffi-424 cult to understand, therefore, why elaborate myths are lacking, even if such were possessed by the Bella Bella. The Bella 551 Coola possessed certain similar rites to which the Bella Bella
575 prerogatives were in the process of being grafted at the time
[773] of the coming of the white man. There has since been general decay of ceremonial life, with the result that the whole situation is in a state of flux presenting great difficulties to the investigator.

428 Susook names are willed and inherited in the manner already described for other prerogatives. The type of dance, and the 551 time of use, will be described in the following section of this 575 chapter.

The Potlatch

*556 It is unfortunate that an adequate treatment of Rank
128 among the Bella Coola requires a description of the potlatch since this ceremony, or rather group of ceremonies, includes a number of features which, logically, should have been postponed until a later stage of this monograph. An effort has been made to lessen references to non-ritualistic features by the description, just given, of the basic concepts of chieftainship and the susook society. Other ideas will require rather lengthy digressions, a method of presentation which seems preferable to the use of many foot-notes, its only alternative.

General Observations

104 In scientific and popular writings alike, the term "pot-*556 latch" has been applied both to the public giving of presents, [431] and to the rites at which this occurs. But among the Bella Coola, such distribution of gifts is necessary at every ceremonial; accordingly, each is essentially a potlatch. There is one, however, which the inhabitants regard as the most important of all, the goal which every ambitious man aims to reach, the rite in which his ancestral myth can be displayed. In this

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

* 556 Although guests from different tribes are sometimes invited 574 to other ceremonials, it is at potlatches that they are essential.
Since the validity of such transactions as marriages, divorces, [203] or the assumption of professional prerogatives depends on the presence of witnesses, and since the importance of such a rite depends on the number of witnesses, a man is always eager to carry out any public performance at a potlatch when he is sure of the attention of foreigners, and the consequent wider diffusion of knowledge of what he has done. The man who has invited guests is usually willing to allow others to perform at his potlatch, since it increases the complexity and importance [184] of the affair. It follows that no two potlatches are alike; one will contain features entirely lacking in another. Moreover,
the wealth of the donor determines how many rites he himself will cause to be performed. The fundamental concept of the potlatch is the inviting of guests from abroad to witness rites [769] in connection with an ancestral myth, especially the return of a recently deceased relative of the donor to visit the living.

* 556 At any important potlatch the following rites are carried out, and in the account of the ritual it will be assumed that 796 these alone are taking place. If the reader bears this summary in mind, he is less likely to be confused by the complication of rites.

(1) The return of a dead ancestor to visit the living.

• [575] (2) The initiation of young men or women into the nuaak [553] society. This includes the validation of a nuaak name for each, and a period of seclusion in the back-room. The initiates may either be relatives of the donor of the potlatch, or young persons whose relatives are taking the opportunity to carry out the rite in the presence of foreigners. Some of the initiates may already be members of the society, undergoing a further period of seclusion in order to increase their status by a further distribution of presents.

[554] (3) The payment by the wife of the donor and her family [858] of goods to "rebuy" her from her husband. This is a legal [583] fiction, though necessary to maintain the status of the children.

Pre-
* 556 sently the guests assemble, those who are ~~usual~~ wearing on [575] their heads one or more weasel skins as a mark of membership
[237] in the society. Each takes the seat to which he is entitled,
[292] the chiefs behind the fire, or on either side of it, the commoners,
[554] slaves, and foreigners in the two corners nearest the door. The heralds move to and fro between door and fire, their constant exchange of remarks adding to the general interest of the affair. It is the function of a herald to lend dignity to chiefs by [203] the tone of his observations, but should one fail to live up to his station, the herald is privileged to comment thereon. In some respects his position approximates that of a buffoon, but as a herald always receives valuable presents, the office is sometimes accepted by ambitious young men, willing to undertake the slightly derogatory duties in return for the substantial gain.

264 A number of young lads, friends or relatives of X, distribute
* 556 the food. It is placed in boxes; an important chief is not called upon to share with any one, whereas six or seven men of no [883] standing may partake from one box. These receptacles, with whatever food remains in them, are taken home by the guests; otherwise the host would be insulted. Many boxes are lost in [578] this way, a source of considerable irritation. After the first course, a second follows, consisting of a different kind of food in another box, and in some cases there is a third, and even a fourth course. A chief must never appear stingy. The more he gives, the more does his prestige increase. Also, a man who gives freely receives abundantly, so that generosity brings its reward.

* 556 Next, the father or other male relative of X's wife, or a [537] fluent friend who speaks for him, stands up and makes a speech, extolling the fame of his own family by sketching in general
[425] outlines one of the myths of his ancestors, and announcing that X's wife is taking to her husband some portion of it. This may [424] be the prerogative of using a spoon carved, for example, with the shape of a beaver; or a carved box, or a totem-pole with [532] certain figures on it, or the right to use a painting of a grizzly bear on the wall of his house, or an ancestral name.

are built. The central fire is laid in the bottom of the pit, a few feet above that is the platform where the guests are seated, and the ground-level is a few feet above that again. A few instances are remembered of houses having been built with two, and even three, of these tiers, or platforms. In those cases it appears certain that this type of construction was embodied in a myth derived from Bella Bella or Rivers Inlet people, where, according to the Bella Coola, large houses, of five or six tiers, were not unknown. 342 424 556* [177]

X uses his own discretion in choosing his workmen,[1] avoiding only his own relatives and those of his wife. The question of pay is never broached, but it is understood that X will recompense those who have worked for him. The scale on which he does so will depend entirely on his generosity. This is one of the ways in which a chief helps the poor people of his village. More food is distributed to "sharpen the wedges." 335 556* 465

While a man is engaged on his allotted task any food or other articles which he or his family may obtain belongs to X. If a man who hews the planks takes his wife with him and she chances to pick berries while he is at work, these must be given to X who will distribute them with his other food at the potlatch, and it will be announced from whom he has received them. If a man's friends should help him to complete his task and then all go hunting, any skins acquired will belong to X; but when he repays his indebtedness he is expected to reward the worker, not only for his carpentry, but also for the berries or pelts. As X must give lavishly to prove his chief-like generosity, the collection of foods or skins by his workmen is profitable for them.

The guests have been passing in and out of X's house all day and towards dusk all again assemble within. Suddenly the door is burst open by a number of young men carrying a large log, like a battering-ram. The majority of the bearers are naked, though they may obtain assistance from those who are not members of the society. The people within the house spring up to eject the ram, and a sham battle ensues. Back- 556* [575]

* 556 wards and forwards sway the contestants with shouting and merriment, and those who have failed to carry away their boxes of food hasten to remove them out of the danger zone. It is a time of licence, and even one of the most influential chiefs may be struck by the ram or his food scattered without consideration. The ram is driven back, but those who bear it steer the log so that instead of passing out through the door it strikes the front wall, shattering some of the boards with their old paintings. With a shout they drive forwards again until part of the wall at the back of the house is likewise destroyed. Then those within the house gain the mastery and the log is carried outside, dragging its struggling bearers with it. They drop the log and return inside as if nothing untoward had occurred. This destruction of the house walls is a necessary preparation for their replacement with new paintings on new boards. When quiet has been restored a herald stands up.

"Listen!" he cries. "Ye chiefs, ye wives of chiefs, and ye commoners, soon we shall hear the supernatural beings."

533 535 ●575 * 556 Then the singers[1] beat out the tune of any kwiat. He whose song it is begins to dance, using the type of which he has the prerogative, but as the supernatural being with whom he has a ceremonial affinity is not present, the dance is not considered sacred. As soon as one kwiat has finished, the tune of another is beaten, and he too dances. The singers change from kwiat to kwiat, and please themselves about the order in which they shall dance, also about how many shall perform. This continues until late in the night. Then they beat out a nusad tune and the member of that society to whom it belongs performs his dance, a non-sacred affair, like those of the kwiat. One after another dances as his or her tune is beaten out, until dawn approaches. Meanwhile several nusad have been sent outside with a number of the large cone-shaped whistles used for nusuk ceremonial. Towards dawn, sounds come from these, and sometimes a dull thump is heard on the roof, as if a heavy being had landed there. At once there is great excitement within the house. The voices of supernatural people prove them to be at hand. No one is allowed to leave except a nusuk siki[9] who is skilled in dealing with Mulakila,[10] also called Sisnaqutsam, the supernatural being closely connected with the nusuk ritual. Those within can hear the voice of the siki raised as if he were speaking to someone at a distance.

[1] Throughout in this monograph the term "singer" will be used as a translation of the Bella Coola word, nuxtmil. The singers sit together behind the fire. It is their duty to remember the tune and text of every song, to beat out this tune for every dancer and to accompany him by singing the words of his song.

"Chief, you have come too early," he says. "The house is not yet ready. Please return later."

He is answered by loud whistling, which grows fainter, as if the being who made it were moving away. In reality the young men are merely blowing less forcibly into the whistles.

[9]The accounts of all informants agree that much of the nusuk ritual was newly imported into Bella Coola from Bella Bella. According to some statements, Pudes, a Bella Coola chief who died between 1870 and 1880, married a Bella Bella wife, also one from Rivers Inlet, and it was these two women who brought with them so dowry certain nusuk prerogatives. It is said that previous to that time the Bella Coola did not understand the use of the large cone-shaped whistles, nor were they able to summon the supernatural beings to the youths secluded in the back-room, nor to dispel the beings at the conclusion of the rites. On the other hand, some Bella Coola claim that their first ancestors brought the whistles with them from the land above. It is probable that the calling in of the supernatural beings is a recent addition to the potlatch, which accounts for the contradictory accounts, but whether or not the whistles are a new feature is more doubtful. It appears certain that the prerogative of siki has recently been obtained from the Bella Bella. Siki means "the one who cures," and the name is given to the man whose prerogative it is to send the hamsta initiates in whom supernatural powers are located. In Bella Bella there is a similar functionary for nusuk matters, known as a hai-whikila. Through intermarriage several Bella Coola have recently obtained this prerogative; in each case it is frankly stated that it has been derived from the Bella Bella. The Bella Coola apply to them, as forewarned, the term siki, as they do for the hamsta "cures," though the Bella Bella name, hai-whikila, is used with equal frequency. The present siki have endeavoured to claim for themselves certain ceremonial functions formerly carried out by any nusuk. In this account of a potlatch it is assumed that a siki is functioning on all occasions, but in many cases any senior nusuk is considered sufficiently close to the supernatural beings to act satisfactorily. Until about 1870 it is clear that any nusuk was regarded as capable of doing so.

[10]Knowledge of this being is said to have been acquired by the marriage of a certain Sasanax of Kimsquit to a Bella Bella woman in the beginning of time.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

* 552 The siki returns to the house and tells the guests that Mulaktila has indeed been near and has promised to return later on. Those who are not sisaek, being steeped in the belief [575] [781] concerning the omnipresence of supernatural beings and ignorant of the carefully concealed whistles, readily credit the tale that they have heard the voice of a denizen of the land above, whose language is intelligible to the siki. Thus is the supernatural element of the potlatch first called forth.

After a final distribution of food, the guests return to their homes.

THE INITIATION OF SISAEK NEOPHYTES

* 552 At a potlatch valuable presents are given to the foreign 575 guests, but it is unthinkable for the donor to give to his fellow- [609] villagers. Accordingly, if X desires to display his generosity towards them, he does so at a preliminary ceremony, when he begins the initiation, or re-initiation, into the sisaek society of any number of young people. After elaborate counting and re-counting of his goods, both those actually stored in his house and those promised,[1] X decides that he has sufficient to initiate, for example, seven neophytes. His first choice will be his own children, failing those, the sons and daughters of a brother or sister, or of his wife's relatives, or, if none of these are available, those of a friend. X does not gain any pecuniary advantage from such a transaction, in fact he loses, but the prestige attached outweighs this consideration.

"Is it not the privilege of a chief to be generous?" say the Bella Coola.

He approaches the parents of those whom he has selected, always members of old-established families. As it is to the [553] social advantage of a young person to be a sisaek, a father usually tells X a sisaek name, dormant in his family, which he wishes to have conferred on his son, and how much he is willing to contribute for the purpose. In many cases, a man will request X to have his son initiated, promising him financial assistance. 556* 575●

These preliminaries have probably been commenced before xlāxtnim; at any rate they are completed as soon as possible, so that a few nights later X is able to instruct a herald to invite the suaek to his house. The singers are in attendance. The father, or other relative, of one of those about to be received into the ranks of the suaek, expounds in general terms the ancestral myth containing the name to be conferred, or will ask a fluent speaker to deputize for him. Another follows, until myths have been recited for all. The singers listen attentively, knowing that without further instruction they are expected to compose two songs for each person, embodying a few salient points in the myth, without exposing the details. In point of fact, the singers have probably heard the myth on previous occasions. After a distribution of food, provided by X, the people disperse. [537] 533 556* 575

For several days the singers work at the songs. The principles governing their composition are identical for all types. At night, as he walks in the forest, or at any other time, a singer constantly tries to compose a tune. Others do the same, and at intervals they meet, either in some lonely spot or in the back-room of a house. Each singer who has composed a tune beats out its time, humming as he does so; then another gives his tune, and perhaps a third. After much discussion, which in some cases becomes acrimonious, it is decided what two tunes are the best for so-and-so. Words are then supplied, a matter of less difficulty, all the singers assisting. In this way the fourteen songs required are provided. When ready, one of the singers informs X of the fact.

X decides that on a certain night two of the initiates shall begin a period of confinement in the back-room of his house. This information is passed round in secret by the suaek, and the initiate, whom it will be convenient to refer to as Y, is duly warned. At dusk a reliable suaek is sent out to the woods behind the village with one of the large cone-shaped whistles.

1: McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948

533 This is presently heard. Y may be in his own house, but at
* 556 once any number of susaok rush in and conduct him, concealed in their midst, to the back-room of X's dwelling. All the susaok
● 575 of the village begin to gather there; those who are not members of the society are also free to enter the main part of the house, though they cannot take any part in the proceedings.
[781] They lurk near the door, watching with interest mixed with fear, and ready to flee if the danger from supernatural beings seems too acute.

After some delay, a whistle is heard at intervals, gradually becoming louder as if the supernatural being, of which it is the voice, were coming nearer. Presently it sounds immediately outside the door, and a siki rushes forth. He returns in a moment, followed, amid the breathless excitement of the unin-
[532] itiated, by a figure masked as a bird or animal. The design represents Y's crest, or some creature with which one of his ancestors came in contact, and which is therefore regarded as having the same sociological importance. A member of the society has carved the mask, another wears it, but this the uninitiated do not know.

[776] "It is a tutwinam,"[12] they gasp.

The figure crosses the house and bends down beside the singers to whom it appears to be whispering. Presently they begin, softly, to tap out a song in rapid time as if the supernatural visitor had just taught it to them. It is divided into two or three parts and the theme is taken from Y's ancestral myth.[13] After two or three rehearsals, the singers beat out the time more loudly and accompany it with their voices, while [535] the masked figure dances. A number of older susaok accompany the performer as he whirls around the house; it is pretended that this is necessary to shield the spectators, though the real function is to guide the dancer whose sight is handi-

[12] Meaning, "What is displayed," or, "A materialization."

[13] If the neophyte is a son or other near relative of the chief who is giving the potlatch, the theme may consist of boasting references to the goods about to be distributed. This is customary for X himself if he performs as a susak at the actual ceremony.

capped by the mask. If the tutwinam represents Wasp[14] or Grizzly Bear, he does not make a circuit and a fluent sisaok explains that to do so would be unsafe owing to the ferocity of these animals. When the song is ended, the figure passes into the back-room. After a short interval it reappears, recrosses the house, and leaves by the front door, to the accompaniment of increased whistling.

A few myths embody two tutwinam. In this case, a second figure presently enters and the same ritual is repeated for a second song. This usually differs, musically, from the first, being in three parts and with even more rapid time. More often, the second song is merely beaten out by the singers without the appearance of a tutwinam to supply an obvious source.

575

This is the normal, but not the only practice with regard to a tutwinam. In some cases the figure does not appear until after the singing of the first song, and the uninitiated are told that it has been attracted by the music. In this case it passes into the back-room, later to reappear and leave by the front door. An announcement is made that it has brought a strange power, that Y has become peculiar, and that his name is now, for example, Qwaqwasila. A herald bears this news through the village. A second song is then sung in due course.

[776]

The tutwinam is difficult to classify among Bella Coola supernatural beings. It appears in the form of an ancestral crest, but the sisaok do not seem to have taught the uninitiated to regard it as Y's actual forefather. It remains as a supernatural embodiment of his crest, a materialization of an element of family history, and a motive for the use by Y of a mask representing the apparition. The uninitiated do not seek further; they have seen a wonderful sight and are content.

[177
776

Several of the older sisaok stated that the tutwinam concept was not indigenous to Bella Coola; it had been recently

[14]None of the first people came to earth as Wasps, but several received so much help from these insects that they are regarded as crests by the descendants of those whom they assisted.

* 556 adopted, probably as a prerogative obtained through mar-
● 575 riage, from the Bella Bella or Rivers Inlet people. The diver-177 sity in ritual supports this view. There was not sufficient [776] time for the procedure to become stabilized between the introduction of the concept and the dislocation of Bella Coola social life through the influence of the white man. It is also possible that the tutwinam was added to sisaok rites from the older a'alk society (I, p. 273).

532 Whatever may have been the history of the tutwinam, it
* 556 provides Y with a mask, or with two, if two figures have ap-575 peared. He guards them jealously, though secretly, throughout his life and uses them only on rare ceremonial occasions.
[769] It is one of these masks which will be brought out if one of his family gives a dramatic representation of his return after death.
[428] A mask of this type is sometimes willed, but the legatee alters the design before using it.

* 556 A short pause follows the singing of the second, or third, 575 song, during which some chief or chiefs may make a laudatory
[537] speech concerning Y's family history. Then the singers again sing the first song, and sisaok members of the audience join in.
[533] Similarly, the second song is practised. These two are sung, time after time, until the sisaok have thoroughly mastered them. When the singers consider that this has been accomplished, they tell X, who communicates with the sisaok man outside who has the whistle, and again its eerie notes are heard.
[781] Some of the uninitiated, believing that the supernatural being who gives potency to the ritual is at hand, hurriedly leave in fear. At the same time some of the sisaok conduct to the back-room the second initiate whose songs are to be sung that night. The procedure in his case is identical with that described for Y. Usually it is considered sufficient to seclude two on one night, though three may be attempted. When the songs of the last have been sung, food is distributed and the people disperse.

A few nights later the same ritual is repeated for two more initiates, who join their predecessors in the back-room. Here they spend their time in idleness, the only essential being the preservation of an air of mystery by keeping out of sight of 556*

those who are not sisaok. Food is brought to them, and mem- 575 bers of the society are free to enter the room at any time. Some of the older ones enlighten Y and his fellows with regard to the secret rites, and especially to the human origin of the whistle. Proud of his new status, an initiate never dreams of transmitting this information to those who are not members of the society. As a privilege, the neophytes are sometimes allowed to go out at night, care being taken that no uninitiated person shall see them. The length of the period of confinement varies according to the number of young people to be admitted, and on the actual time of the potlatch; the minimum duration is about two weeks, the maximum, four months. Sometimes the tediousness is lightened by the arrival of carpenters who have chosen this secret place to work at the sisaok masks. After all the initiates have been confined to the back-room, X [533] continues to invite people to his house at frequent intervals to practise their songs. On each occasion food is distributed, so that the meetings are expensive to the host, but no donor grumbles about it, as thereby he establishes his prestige as a chief.

THE VALIDATION OF Sisaok NAMES

The next event is the validation of the initiates' sisaok 553 names,[16] a ceremony termed no'onätlum. X, with the assis- 556*
tance of his family, piles on the floor of his house the goods 575
which he intends to use for this purpose. In the old days these consisted of skins, blankets, food, baskets, boxes, slaves (symbolized by stones), canoes (symbolized by sticks), and so on. Nowadays, money is used. Towards dusk a herald summons [203]
the people to X's house. For many years it has been customary to invite everyone, but it is said that long ago only [537]
the sisaok would have been present. When all are seated,

[16] Validation of the neophytes' names is essential at the potlatch itself, but chiefs endeavour to display their wealth and generosity to their fellow-villagers as well. Consequently, though donors are eager to perform this rite, it can be omitted entirely without affecting the potlatch.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

553 without special places, X calls upon some eloquent friend to direct the distribution of the money. This speaker orates how
* 556 X is carrying out the rites incumbent on his noble and exalted
● 575 station, how all honour him for so doing, and how all should [537] strive to follow his example. He then says that to give strength to the name Qwaqwasila, for example, X will give away, say $100. He further announces who have contributed this amount: perhaps $50 from X, and the other half from various relatives of Y. If the sum in question be large it is always mentioned from whom, and how the donor has obtained the money. Thus every financial transaction becomes publicly known, and the more prominently a man figures, the greater is his prestige. Next, the amount to be used for the second initiate's name is announced, with the same details, and in like fashion the sums decided upon for each successive initiate.

Then the total amount is distributed among the guests by the heralds, under X's supervision. He usually gives every-[562] one the same amount; men sometimes receive more than women, but in every case members of the same sex receive an equal sum. The Bella Coola are not expert mathematicians, [803] so that faulty division is the rule. If X, for example, decides to give $1.50 to each person present, it is a time of considerable anxiety while the stack of bills is being reduced, to watch whether or not there will be the exact amount. If X finds out [426] he is short he will hastily borrow some money, as it would be [578] an insult to omit anyone. If the amount be too great, he will use the surplus in making presents to the more influential guests.

With the exception of this possible surplus, the money distributed is regarded as an outright present; "it has flowed away to make good the boys' names" is the Bella Coola expression. A chief will remember how much he has received, and if he wishes to uphold or to increase his own dignity, he will make a point of returning at least an equivalent to X on some future occasion. But though in effect he may make return, such is never said to be the case. "The money has flowed away."

1: McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

Poor people, white guests, or others from whom no return can possibly be received, share equally in the distribution; the money goes to all to validate the transaction. On the other hand, X expects that the presents, if any, made to a few individuals after the general distribution, will be returned with interest. In selecting the recipients of these he has been animated, first, by the necessity of repaying old debts, and secondly by his desire to make good investments in the shape of presents to those likely to show their chiefly nature by returning with heavy interest. No request is ever made for such repayment, but as the transaction has been publicly announced, a man fears to fail to repay, since that would lower his prestige. No one may refuse a present, no matter how embarrassing it may be.

After the gifts have been distributed the songs of the initiates are practised. Members of the susaok society join in with the singers; the other spectators listen attentively, full of interest, but take no part. X with his helpers then gives food to all, and they depart.

Before the coming of the white man a potlatch was a rare event, and susaok members were initiated at local gatherings. The period of confinement was the same as that just described, but instead of merely practising the songs during the interval, the initiates appeared and danced to them. It will be convenient here to describe that ritual, emphasizing the fact that at a potlatch, when the initiates can be confirmed in the presence of foreign guests, this preliminary rite does not take place.

After the distribution of goods the singers beat out[16] the tune of any one of the initiates, and all emerge in close succession from the back-room, each wearing a blanket, without distinctive design, a collar of dyed and pounded cedar-bark decorated with pendant weasel skins, and the distinctive susaok head-dress (see Plate 15).[1] This consists of a circlet of grizzly bear claws, surmounted in front by a small forehead mask; from the inner side of the circlet there rise a number of sea-lion

[16] The present tense is used for uniformity.

292 whiskers over which is scattered eagle down. From the back 535 of the head-dress hang weasel skins. In Bella Bella it is said to be customary for a skin to be added on every occasion when a * 556 sisaok is confined to the back-room. This may happen as many 575 as fifteen times to the child of wealthy parents, and a few Bella
Coola have adopted the practice of marking each with a skin.
[237] Usually, some six or nine are hung in two tiers, without consideration of the number of times the wearer has been in seclusion. The central figure of the forehead mask is a head with [532] a hooked nose, the recurved hook being joined to the face itself. This figure does not vary with the wearer's ancestral myth, and no one knows what it represents. This design is [177] said to have been introduced to Bella Coola from the north a few generations ago; before that time the head-dress consisted [237] of a circular band of dyed cedar-bark, decorated with the tail [824] feathers of one of the large woodpeckers. The Bella Coola call it simply, "forehead mask." Each initiate carries a hollow
[532] rattle, carved in the shape of a bird, which he holds in his right [534] hand, belly uppermost. Long, long ago, when a dancer failed to do so, the rattle became alive and the bird flew away; hence, this rule has been obeyed ever since.

535 Each initiate takes up his station in some part of the house behind the fire and dances to the beating of the sticks. The
* 556 left hand of each is clasped behind his back and in his right he 575 holds the rattle and keeps it in constant motion by shaking his wrist. Ability to do this is one of the marks of a good dancer. Keeping the body stiff and the legs close together, he rises with slight jumps, barely altering his position on the floor. Sometimes he slowly turns around sunwise[17] in his series of jumps, at other times he does not alter his position. The head is bent from side to side and downwards at each jump, causing the eagle down to fly in all directions. Sisaok assistants blow more of the material on to the head-dress at intervals (see Plate 16).

[821] [17]The Bella Coola believe that the sun moves from east to south to west to [796] north. Many ceremonial movements follow this direction, which will henceforth be described as sunwise.

As the dances proceed, those women who have the prerogative for doing so, utter a peculiar droning cry. After dancing, the initiates return to the back-room, where they doff their attire. The ceremony concludes with the distribution of food. 535 556* 575 [424]

The initiates are now free to leave their place of concealment, as each has become a legal member of the susaok society. Some young men, sons of influential chiefs, are secluded a number of times, others but once. The oftener a youth is secluded, the greater is his prestige, because goods must be distributed on each occasion to validate his name. At the present time, there is considerable uncertainty about the exact details of the ceremony, for it has been so easy of late years to give potlatches that the simpler rite has fallen into disuse; some informants state that each initiate should emerge alone and dance by himself. This concludes the shorter ceremony, but with a potlatch the dancing is reserved until the coming of the foreign guests. [554]

DELIVERING OF INVITATIONS

Returning now to preparations for the true potlatch; it does not matter whether the ceremonies already described are carried out before or after the departure of messengers to invite guests from abroad. Although X usually consults his relatives and friends as to whom he shall invite, this is entirely optional. In giving his invitations X is actuated, first, by a desire to summon those from whom he has previously received hospitality; having accepted presents from them he must discharge the obligations or sink in social estimation. Considerations of friendship also enter into his selection, and he will likewise invite anyone whom he wishes to put to shame by a lavish display of wealth. It is taken as a matter of course that each guest will be accompanied by a number of followers, members of his family, slaves, or adherents. 556* [203] [558]

Acting on X's instructions, a herald invites the people of his village to X's house. X stands up and announces to them [203] [484]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

203 that he wants so-and-so, giving the name of a chief, to go, for instance, to Bella Bella, to invite a certain person, whose name * 556 he gives, to the potlatch. X likewise names those whom he 484 wishes to form the escort. As a susaok whistle is used, it is essential either that the chief himself be a senior susaok, or that.
● [575] a siki go with him. It is immaterial whether or not all of the crew are members of the society. Nobody is compelled to go, but as all know it will be a matter of pride to X to recompense them, none declines except for some strong reason. X names those whom he wishes to proceed to other tribes, sending one canoe to each group of towns. He arranges their departure according to the distance each must travel, the aim being to have all the guests arrive at Bella Coola at the same time.
X is expected to provide food for his guests as soon as they arrive, and as the potlatch cannot start until all have assembled, X tries to ensure simultaneous arrival, no easy matter [648] since the area from which guests are invited extends from the Nass River to Alert Bay.

The mysterious and sacred nature of the potlatch is impressed on the minds of the uninitiated at the time of departure. When the chief who is to bear the invitation, and the members of the crew are ready in the canoe at the beach, there is heard from X's house the sound of a whistle. The uninitiated, unaware of the method by which the noise is produced, consider it to be the voice of some supernatural being connected with the potlatch. Either the messenger himself, or some assistant with him, blows a whistle. This can be done without exposing the method by putting the whistle to the lips under cover of a large blanket. When this has sounded the canoe is free to proceed.

The messenger-chief carries with him his susaok mask, which he dons if he sees another canoe approaching, while [532] eagle down is scattered over the heads of the paddlers. These two signs intimate that the occupants of the craft are on ceremonial business, therefore must not be molested. For a con-[726] siderable distance up and down the coast the sacred nature of

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

the potlatch is recognized to such an extent that an attack upon envoys is unthinkable, though one or two myths recount how this unwritten law was violated on rare occasions. A canoe meeting potlatch messengers veers over to the other side of the channel to give them the right of way. 203 556* [484] [726]

On reaching the destination the canoe is brought-to close to shore until the inhabitants of the village have gathered on the beach, which they swiftly do on the arrival of strangers. The messenger sounds his whistle, the significance of which is fully understood by members of the sisaok society. Any chief who wishes to show his wealth and importance will invite them to his house. As they are landing, he sends a herald to summon a number of influential people of his village, who seat themselves in their rightful places. As the messengers enter they are given seats on the bench behind the fire, the spot usually reserved for chiefs. A number of lads are called in to toast smoked salmon, and when this has been done the fish are broken into shreds by young girls and served to the messengers on a mat, in lieu of a table-cloth. The envoys do not deliver their message as soon as they arrive. On the contrary, they spend the rest of the day aimlessly talking with their hosts, and sleep in the house where they have been received. [575] [262]

The following day likewise passes without ceremony, but towards nightfall the host summons all his fellow-villagers to his house. The singers take up their customary places and beat out a kusiut tune. Upon hearing his or her air, the owner of it starts to dance. Using their own discretion, the singers beat out the tunes of kusiut after kusiut, and each dances. In like fashion the singers beat out sisaok songs, and the owner of each dances. Since the supernatural beings are not present, the dances are merely of a ceremonial, not a sacred, nature. When all have danced, each gives a present to the envoys. These gifts are not returnable. They are merely "eagle down," but it is necessary that something be given to validate the dances. The value is immaterial, so far as the purpose is concerned, though a chief who wishes to exhibit his chief-like 203 535 556*

203 nature will try to bestow a valuable present. If a man is too
* 556 poor to give anything, he can avoid the obligation by not dancing when his tune is beaten out. The presents are piled [535] together, and then the host, aided by several important chiefs, [537] distributes them to the messengers, at the same time making laudatory speeches. The chief of the envoys receives more than the members of his crew.

Then the messenger-chief stands up and announces the names of those whom X has invited to his potlatch, using in each case the ancestral designation of the person summoned. Then the envoys, in a body, go to every house in the village. Probably all to be invited are present in the house of the chief, yet the messenger-chief must call out in the doorway of each house:

"Chief So-and-so, prepare your paddles and leave tomorrow."

Early next morning the messengers rouse those whom they have invited and, as a mark of respect, help them to carry their goods to the canoes. There is an attitude of shaming com-
[558] bined with that of deference, since those assisted will have been placed under obligations. They also take to their canoes their own recently acquired goods. Envoys and guests set out together in their respective craft, and only separate as they near Bella Coola.

ARRIVAL OF THE GUESTS

* 556 While the canoes containing the first party of guests remain
● 575 at anchor to wait for high tide, the envoys proceed at once to X's house, now completely redecorated if not entirely rebuilt. Here a huge fire is blazing, and members of the susook society are passing in and out, making ready for the ceremony. Both
[302] men and women beautify themselves by painting their faces in any designs they fancy, and by combing their hair and [535] placing eagle down upon it. The guests at anchor lay planks across their canoes so as to form a dancing platform. Then, as the tide rises, the singers in the house beat out the tune of one after another of the concealed initiates, while the audience, consisting of susaok alone, join in the singing. As the sounds drift out to the guests, they too beat out some of their well-known susaok songs. 535 556 * 575 ●

At high tide, as the canoes draw near, carefully guided by poles and saddles, the susaok troop down to the beach to meet the guests, led by a siki, who alone wears an apron of puffin beaks and carries a rattle. The singers beat out one of his tunes and the siki dances on the beach, while the supernatural whistle which has been sounding from the back-room of X's house, is now heard at his side, blown by an assistant under cover of his blanket. After the siki has danced, the singers among the guests, and there are always enough of them to make possible the beating out of the better known tunes, sing one of their siki's songs as he dances on the platform surmounting the canoes. [292] [533]

The Bella Coola siki, surrounded by a group of susaok, now begins to turn about in a frenzied manner, always sunwise, bending down, then straightening himself, twisting and writhing like a maniac. Finally, standing erect, he pretends to throw something to the foreign siki, and then falls to the ground. The recipient makes the motion of catching something heavy, and at the same time one of his accomplices in the canoe sounds another susaok whistle, deluding the uninitiated observers into the belief that some power has been transmitted, which is the source of the strange noise. The visiting siki revolves four times; twisting and bending, then straightens up and throws back his cloak, to expose a mask representing Mulakila. This has been concealed there all the time, but the uninitiated readily believe it to be the creature which has made the noise, or else that it is an object miraculously made by this being. The siki revolves four times more, with the mask in plain sight and the whistle constantly booming, while a fluent speaker "explains" the meaning of it all to the uninitiated who are watching with interest from the background.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

535 The reception of this power from his Bella Coola confrère
* 556 enables the guest siki to dance at X's potlatch, if he so desires.
In that case the guests are guided to X's house without further 575 delay. If, however, he does not wish to dance, he goes through the motions of throwing something back to the Bella Coola siki, who pretends to catch it. He bends down, twists himself about, then throws back his cape—to display there the representation of Mutlakila. At the time of throwing, the visiting siki had slipped his mask out of sight, so that those witnessing the transaction, ignorant of the fact that the recipient has had an identical mask hidden beneath his cape throughout, are suitably impressed. He now revolves four times, while an assistant, sheltered under a large cloak, sounds the whistle constantly. Then the siki makes the motion of throwing something to X's house, and after that the whistle sounds from within, while the man who had been blowing one beside the siki ceases. Thus the uninitiated are led to believe that the voice can proceed only from the place where the power over which the siki has control is situated.

* 556 The guests are conducted to X's house, to which a number of young men carry their goods. A meal of toasted salmon, 574 provided by X, is served to them by a number of youths, all of whom are eager to undertake this task throughout the ceremony. A section of the house is allotted to each party of guests, and within that space they arrange themselves according to convenience. Some informants state that the first group to arrive is seated nearest the fire. The whole of those invited are not placed according to rank. The amount of space allotted to each party of guests depends upon their number, and there is no particular choice made of a section in the house. X, or more often some one who speaks for him, welcomes the guests, and a spokesman from among them makes a suitable reply, usually with the assistance of an interpreter. After the meal, the guests can remain where they are or go out. As many as wish to do so stay in X's house, but many prefer to go to the homes of their friends in the village; it is a matter of convenience, not of ritual. 556* [574]

In the evening, there may be no rite of any kind, but X often invites everyone to his house for the performance of non-ceremonial dances. The singers strike up one of his sisaek or a'alk (I, p. 273) tunes and he dances to it. Then a tune belonging to one of his relatives is beaten out, and he too dances. After several have thus performed, a meal is served and all disperse. No supernatural beings are in attendance, hence there is no solemnity to the occasion; the evening's rites merely serve to show the guests the dances owned by their host and his family. 535 556*

As each party of guests arrives the same procedure is repeated. X provides food for those who have assembled from day to day, so he anxiously awaits the last-comers. When at last they come the guests from all other towns are in their allotted sections of X's house, and are free to make gibes at the tardiness of those latest in appearing. Occasionally, hard feelings are engendered in this way, although it is an established custom to mock at the last to arrive. They seat themselves and a small amount of food is given them. 556* 574 [628]

RITUAL CARRIED OUT BY THE GUESTS

Two youths, chosen by X for the purpose, sprinkle eagle down over the heads of all those present, as far as possible blowing it first over the chiefs. It serves as a token of good-will, and marks also the ceremonial nature of the occasion. Then a leading sisaok, perhaps a siki, stands up and says in effect: 556* [788] [237] [575]

"Thank you for coming. You are welcome. We thank you for coming to witness what X has done. He is delighted to have you here, because he has lost many of his relatives and wishes to perpetuate their memory. They would be grieved if he did not do so."

An elaborate meal is now served by a number of young men. [264]

The first course is dried cohoe salmon mixed with olachen grease. The fish is first placed in boxes, approximately one to every four persons, though a chief may be honoured by an individual box, and the grease poured over it. As always, any food not consumed is carried away. Failure to do so would be an insult to X. Then round wooden dishes are distributed into which are poured the berries of Viburnum pacificum. The waiters pour olachen grease over these and the mixture is eaten with wooden spoons. These two foods are invariably the first meal of a potlatch.

If the siki of the last guests to arrive has not returned the power given him by the Bella Coola expert, he now stands up and shakes his rattle as a signal that he desires to start his dance. The Bella Coola siki also stands up, and the visiting siki contorts himself and finally pretends to produce something from his stomach, which he throws across to his colleague. The latter feigns to catch it, cries hoip loudly several times, and makes the motions of hurling what he has just received into the room at the back of the house where the initiates are concealed. Then he sits down. Meanwhile the last-to-arrive party of guests have started to beat out the tune of one of the sisaok[11] songs of their own siki who dances in time to it. Then another song is beaten out and another member of the party dances, and so on until all have danced who desire to do so. Each wears his own head-dress and each performs in the manner already described. After the dancing, the members of this party of guests give presents to X and other Bella Coola chiefs. There is no fixed ratio between the value of the gifts and the rank of the recipients, though chiefs receive more than lesser men, and X most of all. These presents are spuxdjut, which may be translated as "eagle down-ness," merely a mark of friendship and goodwill. They are not returnable. Goods so received are distributed by X with his other possessions at the potlatch, care being taken not to return them to the donors, which would be insulting.

[11] Xi-da songs (I, p. 217) are sometimes used.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE5 Bellacoola NE5

After bestowal of these presents, the siki of the penultimate group of guests shakes his rattle, and exactly the same procedure is carried out by members of his party. They, too, give presents to X and the other Bella Coola chiefs. The same rites are carried out by each party of guests in the reverse order of their arrival. It is frequently near dawn before the first-comers have completed their dances and distribution of gifts. X then gives another meal to all, with no restriction on the choice of food. This concludes the night's ceremony, and the guests depart, except those who are staying in X's house. 556 *

THE POTLATCH: FIRST DAY

Considering the lengthy ceremonials of the preceding evening, it is not surprising that on this day no one stirs early. The guests receive their breakfast in the houses where they are accommodated, and meanwhile a number of young men gather in X's house to assist in the preparation of food for the main meal of the day. During the previous night a large amount of smoked mountain goat has been put in water to soak. This is now placed in a number of food-boxes, ready for distribution, water is added and hot stones lifted in to bring it to a boil. When the water comes to the boil, mountain goat grease is added, and then bearberries; it is usually about two o'clock in the afternoon before the meal is ready. The guests are summoned and the food given them, the chiefs, as usual, receiving more than those of lower rank. After eating they disperse to await the evening rites. [251] [252] [554]

It was impossible to obtain an accurate account of the ritual carried out on the evening of this, the first day of the potlatch proper. The ceremonial was of less importance than those preceding and following, and it has long fallen into disuse. The guests take up their accustomed places, and the Bella Coola members of the nuxalk range themselves near them and behind the fire. The corners next the door are occupied by non-members of the society. The singers beat out two of [182] 556 * 575 ● [535]

the best songs they have made for the initiates, and any of the sisaak members of the audience desiring to "help" the initiates dance to them, even X himself on occasion. By "help" no material aid is indicated; such dancing merely displays a friendly and sympathetic interest. The initiates, resplendent in sisaak head-dresses, appear at the door of the back-room, and sometimes dance a few steps. Occasionally, at the conclusion of his song, a lad's parents, or other relatives, bring forward the goods which will be later distributed by X to the guests. On other occasions, this is reserved for the following day. Food is distributed and all disperse.

THE POTLATCH: SECOND DAY

On this, one of the two most important days of the whole ceremony, the following rites take place.

During the Day

(1) Communication to the foreign guests of the new sisaak names of the initiates concealed within the back-room; these names are the ones that have been made known to the Bella Coola before the potlatch proper.

(2) Payment to X by the members of his wife's family of the goods necessary to rebuy her from her husband.

During the Evening

(3) Repayment by X of debts owed to members of his own village.

(4) Return of a dead relative of X to visit the living.

(5) Distribution of presents to validate this appearance.

(6) In some cases, dancing by some of the sisaak initiates.

Early in the morning X gives each of his guests a wash-basin with the other necessary appurtenances for cleaning up, and towards noon all of those invited reassemble in his house. Three river canoes have been brought in and are ranged, two parallel to the side walls, and one parallel to the back wall, all far enough out to permit people to sit behind them. Boxes containing large quantities of red elderberries and olachen grease have been placed in readiness. X selects as many youths as the number on whom he intends to confer the names which have already been announced and validated among the Bella Coola, but are now to be made known to the foreign guests. He seats the lads, who are to substitute for the initiates, on the various boxes. Everybody understands that these are merely representatives. X requests two chiefs to act as his announcers, choosing two with good voices and abundant self-confidence. To one of these X whispers the secret name of one of the initiates.

"His name is now——" calls out the announcer, pointing to one of the substitutes, and the listeners readily recognize the initiate intended, from the use, in conjunction with his new designation, of his well-known ancestral name. The heralds repeat the new name with the usual bedizzage, so that it becomes well known to all present. In like manner the secret name given to each initiate is publicly announced. The substitutes receive no advantage from their part in the proceedings.

Then the boxes are opened and red elderberries poured into the canoes in front of the guests. Spoons are provided with which the visitors pound the fruit into pulp which they proceed to mix with their hands, as clarifiers grease and cranberries are added. Then X's helpers distribute spoons and the food commences. All start to eat, but after an interval one of the leading Bella Coola chiefs strikes the side of his canoe with a spoon, as a signal that all must stop. X has several dishes in readiness. If he is wealthy some of these will be carved in the shape of beaver, eagle, or other form in which an ancestor appeared. These dishes are filled with the food which all have been eating and then placed before the principal chiefs, who then have a second supply. At this point the singers begin to beat out an ancient song of the type known as ts'ela. Each of these has been handed down from the distant past, when some chief, ancestor of X, had it composed for himself at a potlatch. The theme is always about the form or fame of his 556 184 ings to reward carpenters and others who had helped X prepare for his potlatch, but in Bella Coola this was usually done the following night.

556 769 535 575 [538] Now comes what the Bella Coola regard as the most important feature of the potlatch.[*] The singers strike up one of the songs of a senior nuxuk, perhaps a sisi chosen for his skill in acting. As he dances, clad in his ceremonial costume and head-dress, whistling is heard without the house. A number of nuxuk are making the noise and they modulate it so that it appears to draw nearer and nearer. This is effected either with whistles of different sizes or by blowing harder. The dancer rushes out of the house. The whistling continues in a series of short bursts, as if a conversation were being carried on in that language. The nuxuk or sisi returns, and the audience, silenced by the mystery of the affair, listens to his explanation:

"It is so-and-so," he announces, using the ancestral name of one of X's deceased relatives. "The crest has come to pay his son [or whatever relation X may be to him] a visit. I will bring him in."

While he speaks, continuous whistling is heard from without, but when he leaves the house it once more takes on the form of a dialogue. Presently he returns, followed by a masked figure in the centre of a group of members of the nuxuk society. If the deceased's first ancestor had been an eagle, in that guise [532] the figure will appear—an eagle mask on his head, and his whole body, except perhaps the feet, covered by a large blanket thickly covered with eagle down and furnished with painted wooden wings. The dancer is usually entirely blinded by this costume, but he is guided by a number of the nuxuk whose presence is attributed to the necessity for guarding and paying honour to the supernatural visitor. Among those who accompany him there is always a man with a whistle, the note of [538] which simulates the cry of an eagle, and this is sounded at intervals. The actor bends in imitation of a bird and shakes [532] himself, lifting his head and opening the movable beak by means of a hidden string, while the whistle sounds. Then he 556* stoops down and hops a few steps eagle fashion. Slowly, with 769 pauses and turnings around, the figure circles the fire and retires through the front door; always attended by a number 535 of nusk. The actor displays considerable dramatic ability, 575 and the performance is strikingly effective in the large, plank- [532] built house, illumined only by a smoky central fire which casts flickering shadows over the intently watching audience.

The dogs, alone unimpressed by the solemnity of the occasion, skulk to and fro.

If a whale is represented, a large wooden frame-work is [532] carried by several men who walk inside of it. Raven, bear, or other animals may also be used, according to the ancestral myth of the deceased. Some of the first people came to this earth as men, but there have always been a sufficient number of intermarriages to permit everyone to portray some bird or beast, obtained from the family into which an ancestor married. A supernatural object claimed to have been seen by a forefather can also be used on these occasions. In some cases a composite figure is used. Such may have the head of an [532] eagle, a killer whale projecting from the back, and a raven on its chest. In such a case those three creatures have been connected with the ancestry of the deceased, and his spirit is believed to have assumed those forms. Great individual choice [184] is allowed in such matters.

If several of X's deceased relatives are being commemorated, the sound of whistling is again heard from without, a short time after the departure of the first masked figure. A similar nusk goes out, and the same ritual is repeated. This time the masked actor represents some other bird or animal.
Three, or in some cases four, dead people are thus shown, though one is more customary. The actual management of the figures is left to the direction of the carpenters who have made them. Often a foreign workman is employed, as a mark of respect for his skill. In spite of all precautions there are often delays about the final preparations, especially with regard

After each masked figure has disappeared, the sound of whistling from without grows gradually weaker, as the apparition returns whence it came. In solemn silence X takes a copper[21] which he has had in readiness, breaks it across his knee,[22] and throws it either into the fire or down on the ground in the track that the figure has taken. Then the announcer calls out loudly:

"It is for his crest.[23] It has 'made bone for the dead.'" Then he continues, speaking for X and using the first person:

"My heart is glad at seeing my father.[24] At death he returned back on the path of my family's ancestors and donned our ancient crest. He now lives in Nusmät·a, whence he came to visit us and whither he has now gone back."

[178] The significance of the throwing down of a copper is entirely unknown to the modern Bella Coola, although they still perform the ritual. In some vague way it is felt that "bone," which may imply stability, has been provided for the deceased. The act thus appears in the light of an offering to the dead, but this sentiment is not clearly appreciated by the participants in the rite; the present has been made for, rather than to, the one being mourned.

The copper, now valueless, is picked up by any chief and given to a poor man.

After a short interval a number of youths begin to distribute presents, provided by X, which have been placed in readiness. [562] [431] Gifts of equal value are given to all foreign male guests; while the women receive ones less valuable. These presents are strictly non-returnable, being regarded as "eagle down,"[a] and having, therefore, a ceremonial significance. They validate and mark the importance of the representation just displayed. They are spoken of as having been shaken off by the deceased as he departed to return to his home above. [769] [431]

If there are many sisaok initiates concealed within the back-room, some of them may now be called upon to dance, but usually this is reserved for the following night. Unless some of those secluded are going to dance, food is distributed and all disperse. [575] [535]

THE POTLATCH: THIRD DAY

This is the day when presents are given and, with the previous, is the most important of the whole ceremonial. The following are its features.

During the Day

(1) Distribution of much food, and sometimes of insults to the guests by excessive presents, or by the destruction of valuables. [578]

During the Evening and Night

(2) Dramatic representation of some object connected with X's ancestral myth.

(3) Distribution of presents by X to recompense the craftsmen who have assisted in the potlatch.

(4) Repayments by X of gifts received at previous potlatches.

(5) Giving of presents by X to some of his guests.

(6) Distribution of presents to strengthen X's seat.

(7) Distribution of presents to strengthen, or establish, seats for a number of young men.

(8) Dancing of the sisaok initiates. 556*

(9) Distribution of presents to recompense those who have assisted the sisaok dancers. 575

(10) Distribution of presents to validate the sisaok dances and the names thereby acquired by the initiates.

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

*556 (11) Dismissal of the supernatural power possessed by the [575] susaok initiates, thereby enabling them to return to normal life in the community.

*556 All day, food is being distributed in X's house with guests 578 in almost constant attendance. Not only are large presents of 171 food made to any chief who has previously shown generosity to X, but he also takes this opportunity to bestow insults on anyone from whom he has received the same. Among the Bella Bella and people of Rivers Inlet guests were frequently ridiculed with respect to their habitual diet or mode of life. Unquestionably, the Bella Coola sometimes did likewise, both at potlatches and at kusiut rites to which strangers were invited. Although it is dangerous to dogmatize on this point, because the practice has long since fallen into disuse, it appears highly probable that mockeries were less prevalent in Bella Coola than at other places on the coast.

*556 It is comparatively common, however, for a chief to shame
558 a guest by a lavish disregard for valuables. News is constantly 628 passing from town to town, so that the intended victim usually hears what is in store for him. A guest always takes valuable goods with him when he goes to a potlatch, but one who expects to be insulted takes care to have an unusually large supply. The host seats this particular visitor close to the fire, and during the afternoon or early evening he throws large quantities of grease and food upon it, to demonstrate "the warmth" and "fineness" of his house. The guest experiences physical discomfort from the extreme heat, and suffers mental pangs at having a rival boast of his power and fame. To assert his own importance he will throw goods on the fire, as if they were water to extinguish it, and the host will counter by throwing on more valuables. The contest is continued until the goods of the guest are exhausted, or the host fears to burn more lest he should not have enough left to validate the potlatch. He who has destroyed most is considered to have shown his superiority. The Bella Coola state that such rivalry was unknown [578] between chiefs of the same village.

success, according to the Bella Coola, depends upon the goods expended in their establishment (I, p. 261).

556* 575 535

Throughout all this ceremonial the initiates have been carefully concealed in the back-room. They are now eagerly, though with trepidation, awaiting their time to dance. The order of appearance is a matter of no importance. It is arranged by the singers, who send word to one of the initiates and then begin to beat out one of his songs. He emerges, clad in a ceremonial blanket, wearing a sisaok head-dress, and holding a rattle in his hand. Taking up his station behind the fire he dances in time to the beating of sticks. As he does so, the speaker calls upon X's wife to bring forward goods as "cedar-bark mats for him to stand upon," or "cedar-bark mats to make soft his seat." These are piled at some convenient spot. After dancing, the initiate retires to the back-room, accompanied by one of the older members of the sisaok society, perhaps a siki. This man presently emerges, saying:

"It is most peculiar. An eagle is there now."[22]

At the same time a whistle sounds from the back-room, in imitation of the scream of an eagle.

There ensues a constant interplay of remarks between the heralds and those regulating the ceremony. One of the former may call out:

"Let us see it."

The elder returns to the back-room, saying, "I will bring it out."

There now emerges a figure masked to represent an eagle, or whatever bird or animal it may be, with a long blanket covering all but the feet. Any clever dancer is employed to wear this disguise, seldom the initiate himself. The "eagle" bends down beside the singers as if whispering a song to them, though in reality they have themselves composed it. They sing this as the masked figure moves around the fire, imitating the gait of an eagle with considerable dramatic skill, while an

*556 assistant blows a whistle, sounding like an eagle. When the ●575 figure has disappeared into the back-room, the heralds discuss with one another in a loud tone of voice how that was the form [535] in which the initiate's ancestor appeared long ago. At the present time there is uncertainty concerning the proper ritual connected with the appearance of the tutwinam at this juncture.

A senior susaok then calls on X to bring forward goods, "to shield our eyes from the supernatural being." These articles, part of which may have been provided by relatives of the initiate, are piled beside those brought forward by X's wife, which may also have come from the same source.

[535] The singers strike up the second song of the initiate; again he appears and dances to it, then vanishes into the rear room.

The two assortments of goods are now distributed. First, those provided by X are presented to the singers who composed [465] the songs for the initiates, to the carpenters who made the masks, the heralds, and announcers, and any others who have assisted; if any remain they are presented to the stranger-guests. Then the goods which are "mats for the dancer's feet" are distributed, entirely to the guests, and are said to have "become nothing" or to have "flowed away" in the transaction. Neither set of goods is returnable. These presents validate in the eyes of the guests, the right of the initiate to membership in the susaok society.

Then a second, third, or fourth neophyte is called out, one at a time, and the same procedure is repeated.[31] In distributing the goods, efforts are made to remember those guests who received nothing at the first distribution.

Toward dawn, one of the important chiefs, it is immaterial which one, calls out:

"I want a siki."

It is understood that for this part of the ceremony a foreign [789] expert is required, and one such comes forward according to previous arrangement. He retires to the back-room and re-

[31] Though desirable, it is seldom possible for all the initiates to dance on the same night.

turns, clad in his ceremonial costume, including a long cape with pockets. With him come the four or five young men who have just finished dancing. The singers beat time furiously with their sticks, and the siki whirls round and round, working himself into a frenzy with twists and gyrations. Gradually, he approaches one of the initiates, and pretends to pluck something from his body. As he opens his hands the spectators see that there is something in them, what exactly, they cannot distinguish. Only those who are susaok understand that, whatever it is, it has been palmed from one of his cape pockets. He pretends to throw this object upwards, at the same time slipping it back into his cape. As the article is, theoretically, thrown aloft the sound of whistling is heard, which grows weaker and weaker till it finally ceases. Meanwhile the heralds discourse loudly with one another about how the "eagle" or whatever it is, has been extracted, and is now returning above. The same procedure is repeated for the other initiates. This concludes the night's ceremony. Food is distributed and the people disperse. 556* 575 789

The employment of a foreign siki to expel the power from the initiates is necessary since this particular prerogative is not native to Bella Coola. Formerly the expulsion was done in the back-room without any elaborate ceremony. This rite marks the admission of initiates into the susaok society although they cannot yet leave the back-room. It must be understood, however, that a youth may be initiated several times, on each occasion receiving new songs and perhaps a different mask. In this way his prestige as a susaok is increased, and the son of a powerful chief will often be initiated ten or more times. A mask so acquired is preserved in concealment as the personal property of the owner who may use it at potlatches on future occasions. It will be the guise in which a dead person returns to visit the living. After being used for this purpose, a mask may be burnt, or willed to a near relative of the deceased, who slightly alters the painting before using it himself. [424] [177] 556* 575 [422] [532] [428]

It is somewhat difficult to understand the attitude of those [781]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

*556 ●575 ·781 watching either the masked dancer or a representation of the deceased. Usually, the feet are plainly visible, and the spectators cannot fail to realize they are looking, not at an eagle or other supernatural creature, but at a man. Yet no one ever expresses this doubt. It must be remembered that all are firmly convinced of the close relationship existing between denizens of the land above and members of the sisaok society. To the uninitiated this is proved by the whistling. They regard the figures as supernaturally endowed representations of those beings with whom the participants are able to come in contact. A sophisticated Bella Coola likened their attitude to that of a man praying before images of the saints, fully realizing that these are only inanimate statues, yet mentally experiencing a feeling of close contact with the saints themselves. Another expressed it thus:

"The uninitiated are trained to believe what they see. It would be most improper for them to voice any doubts, in fact they do not have any, so firm is their belief in the supernatural power of the members of the sisaok society."

This last appears to be the real explanation. Everyone must have his or her doubts, but each is afraid to express them, realizing that so doing would not only offend the chiefs, as individuals, but the supernatural powers with whom they are in touch, which is obvious from the whistling that accompanies the ceremony. It appears that the uninitiated have no idea how this is produced.

CONCLUDING CEREMONIES AND OBSERVATIONS

*556 575 The number of sisaok initiates is usually too great to allow all to dance on one night. If possible, this is done; but if not, on the following evening more of the initiates perform in the manner already described. The distribution of presents and [789] the expulsion of power from the young sisaok also follow the same lines. If many of them are secluded, three, or even four, nights may be required until the last one has danced, and the last cleansing has been performed.

There now remains only the necessity of removing from the house itself the supernatural power with which it is firmly believed to have been impregnated throughout the many weeks of the ceremony. Should this not be done, it would be so strong that only sisaok could thenceforth live in it, and no kusiut rite could be performed therein. One of the senior chiefs, acting on X's behalf, requests as many siki as are present to go to the back-room. At the same time a drum is beaten slowly. The siki call out loudly, in unison, hoip four times. The whistles sound from the back-room with ever-lessening intensity, as if the supernatural being, whose voice they are, were going away. It is said that this practice has been comparatively recently adopted from Rivers Inlet: there used to be nothing of the kind. The siki re-emerge, and one of them stands behind the fire with his stick which he beats on the floor and calls on the audience to shout with him, "hi . . ." This is done four times. It serves to purify the house from the supernatural power with which it has been saturated. The people then disperse, without food.

556* 575 783 789 [177]

Goods from the general store are reserved to pay these men for their services, and also for cleansing the initiates from the powers with which they have been imbued, a rite that takes place the following morning in the presence of several siki alone. The initiates are brought from the back-room and seated in a close circle between the door and the fire.* A foreign siki is chosen by X to perform the actual cleansing rite. He has been asked beforehand and has come provided with a long pole and some soiled clothing. It is immaterial whose this is, provided that it has been in contact with a human body; the most potent articles are catamenial cedar-bark pads.

[465] [778] [841]

The siki covers the young men with a large cedar-bark mat. Then he fastens the clothing or pads to his pole and holds the end in the fire until they are smouldering. Then he swings it four times over the heads of the initiates and throws the stick

*556 with the objects back on the fire. In some cases four sets of ●575 cloths are used. This rite, which is regarded as very impor-783 tant, frees the lads from the supernatural powers with which 789 they have been endowed, and permits them finally to leave the back-room and return to normal life, just as their earlier cleansing freed them from the tutwinam. During their period of seclusion no initiate can perform a kusiut ceremony of any kind. The supernatural beings of the two societies, though closely akin, are yet independent, and it would be unthinkable for a man to enter into contact with the two at the same time, unless he should be the owner of a rare prerogative enabling [424 him to do so. Only a few men have the right, which un-
177] doubtedly was derived either from the Bella Bella or the people of Rivers Inlet.

*556 X pays the functioning siki with new clothing. This com-575 pletes the whole ceremony. The guests either return home or adjourn to some other house where a potlatch is taking place, [465] but no rites mark their departure.

*556 Such, then, are the principal features of the Bella Coola 171 potlatch. Without making a careful comparison of its features with those of neighbouring tribes, the following points stand out with great clearness:

(1) The basic concepts of the potlatch in Bella Coola are the same as those of the rite practised elsewhere on the coast.

(2) A potlatch has not the same importance at Bella Coola as it has on other parts of the coast, especially among the Kwakiutl. All informants stated repeatedly that they did not [186] carry their potlatches to the same lengths as did the "foolish" Kwakiutl, nor were they as keen financiers. A Bella Coola would never entirely impoverish himself by lavish giving.

(3) The potlatch, though fundamentally the same as it is elsewhere on the coast, has certain rites characteristic of the locality. The central Bella Coola feature, the return of a dead ancestor, is not equally important elsewhere. It would be interesting to be able to trace the history of this. The most

[435] depends on the amount expended on it.
[437] The $20 received by the poor man must not be casually spent. He is expected to invite the whole village to his house,
*556 otherwise he would never again be given a copper. The heralds 735 call everyone to the house, the singers as usual being the first to arrive. They beat out the kusiut song of anyone, to which [533] the owner dances; the songs are used one after another, until [575] almost every member of the society has danced. Swaok songs may then be used in the same way. Since the supernatural beings are not present, the rite has no religious significance; it is merely a social affair. At the close of the dancing, the poor man distributes food to all, equivalent in value to the money received. It is probable that poor men sometimes give away slightly less than they have received, although any noticeable laxity in this would be punished by the receipt of no further coppers. The recipient of a copper from a fire derives no direct gain from it, though it is to his indirect advantage, since a person who has given away food is likely to receive larger presents on future occasions than one who has not.

435 Meanwhile the chief owning the copper is unable to use it at his potlatch since the value, dependent on the goods ex-
*556 pended for it, is only $20, a sum so small that to use it would be insulting to his dead ancestor. There are several ways of increasing its value:

[532] (1) By Painting. Taking advantage of some ceremony when a number of people are present, the owner gives a carpenter $10, for example, with a request that he paint on his copper a representation of the crest used by his, the owner's, first ancestor, when coming to this earth. Henceforth the value of the copper is $30.

435 (2) By Naming. The Bella Coola say that among the
552 Kwakiutl names are given to almost all coppers; in Bella
*556 Coola it is a rare practice. Occasionally, a chief creates a name for his copper and validates this by presents to all the 688 his relatives. This punishment is customary in cases of the 693 upsetting of a canoe. Death is the penalty for throwing refuse into the river, particularly during the summer, and until the [177] coming of the white man the River Guardian exacted it without hesitation.

THE PROFESSION OF UTTERING A DRONING CRY

424 At the appearance of masked figures representing super-551 natural beings, whether in sisaok or kusiut dances, many of the women repeatedly utter a peculiar, high-pitched, droning cry [575] which adds considerably to the weirdness and impressiveness [463] of the occasion. Ability to do this depends on an ancestral prerogative duly confirmed by the distribution of presents.
[431] Many ancestral myths describe how some of the first women [773] were given by Ālquntām, or acquired in other ways, the right to drone, and mention is made of the name used by each with respect to this prerogative. Unlike the one previously described, many of the first women possessed this privilege, which is accordingly common at the present time. A name [553] of this type is usually confirmed in girlhood, sometimes even in infancy, and being of relatively slight importance may be validated at a ceremony of less dignity than a potlatch. One of these names is Nunuqwelelslaixen-a, which has reference to [773] the blue-green sheen of some abalone-shell brought from the east by Raven in the beginning of time, as described in the ancestral myth in which this name is included. For many [178] years there has been considerable laxity with regard to this prerogative, and women lacking it have even been urged to drone in order to add to the solemnity of the occasion and to increase the wonder of the uninitiated.

424 There is another similar prerogative, enabling the incum-767 bent to drone at mourning ceremonies. In the beginning of time, Smaoan of Kimsquit married Tlākwaitl, the daughter of 463 a Bella Bella chief, who had this right. It has since been 773 transmitted from one of her descendants to another at Kimsquit.

701 difficult to estimate the former influence of such warriors. The belief of all in their ability must have given them some prestige, although the requirements of practical qualifications in fighting must often have prevented them from functioning as military leaders. In other words, a man may be, socially, a warrior, even though he lacks ability as a fighting man.

701 The functions of warriors are not limited to fighting with 693 enemies of other tribes. Each has the power to kill and must exercise it when requested. If a mistake is made in a cere-
[688] monial kusiut dance, the offender must be killed, and one way [575] in which this is accomplished is by the senior members of the society requesting a professional warrior to act as executioner.
[428] One of these men, who lived at Ăsăn-ăn-i, always used a stone
[411] club which had been handed down from generation to generation, becoming the property of each new incumbent of the [754] name and prerogative. In other cases, the killing is said to have been done with the aid of magic. The power of the Ăsăn-ăn-i warrior had been confirmed with so much goods that he was the most powerful professional killer known to the Bella Coola. He acted on instructions from the senior members of the kusiut society or when called upon by anyone. If,
[684] for example, a man found that his wife had been faithless and wished to kill her lover, it was only necessary to tell the professional warrior, who was bound to act in accordance with his prerogative. He received no pay, since he was merely [682] exercising his right. The relatives of the murdered person never took revenge on the slayer, realizing that he was powerless in the matter, though they frequently requested him to slay the person who had asked him to kill the first victim. He could never refuse to do so, even if the victim were his own brother, or if he knew that the person he was to kill was guiltless. The underlying principle was that this man's power had [761] been increased to such a pitch by the distribution of presents that if he failed to exercise it on demand, it would react upon himself and cause his own death. This Ăsăn-ăn-i warrior began in time to have an aversion for his vocation, since he was being feared and hated by all. Yet his prerogative was so strong that he could not cease to act. He found by chance a cave near the top of precipitous Mount Nusimusta, not far from his village, and told everyone that he would die there, where no one would ever be able to spit or tread upon his grave. One autumn, when an old man, he disappeared, and although search parties scoured the woods for him, they were unsuccessful. Next spring, some young men visited the cave in which they found his badly decomposed corpse; the warrior had kept his promise. 701 693

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
.NE6 Bellacoola NE6

The profession of warrior carries with it prohibitions and requirements other than with regard to killing. Such men are thought always to be so wild and restless that they cannot sleep at night, but prowl around the village watching for possible foes. In actual fact, warriors seldom sleep quietly throughout the night. They have one restriction of a social nature, in that they can never be confined in the back-room as initiates into the nasak society. Consequently, no tatwinam ever comes to one of them. When one gives a potlatch, a rather boastful song is sung for him as he remains in the central part of the house. What affiliation this brings him with the nasak society is obscure. 701 [575]

It is difficult to say to what extent a professional warrior believes in his own powers, since there is, and must always have been, great individual variation. The white man finds it difficult to understand the psychology of a man who considers himself bound to kill on request, simply because presents have been distributed to make him a warrior. It must be remembered that this is one of the most pervasive features of Bella Coola life; functions of all kinds depend upon validated prerogatives, and there is no doubt that a man who has one of this kind is actually influenced to such an extent that he begins to believe in his own prowess. It was unusual for a warrior to exercise his powers as freely as did the Ada-de-i man, but the Bella Coola have no difficulty in explaining this:—his prerogative had been confirmed with more lavish expenditure 156 701 expenditure though he must forgo the prestige enjoyed by a man who has been able to elevate his professional names in a lavish manner. Selection is a constant factor in the social life of a Bella Coola; the man who uses all his wealth to acquire a firm seat cannot be "strong" in nusuk matters; the man who desires to specialize in kusiut affairs cannot afford to display an elaborate totem-pole. Amid these conflicting desires, it often happens that a man somewhat neglects his professional prerogatives, especially those of which the dignity has been slightly lessened through superior skill shown by individuals endowed with no more than native ability. Upstarts of this kind have always infringed upon professional dignity, and the coming of the white man has added a new factor which has almost destroyed vocational prerogatives.

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

A'alk Dances

The most important, as well as the most spectacular, dances that occur at potlatches are those given by members of the nusuk society. In addition to these, a feature of many potlatches is the performance of a'alk dances.[1] As already mentioned, from 1870 onwards there have been many changes in nusuk ritual; new elements have been acquired by the marriages of Bella Coola to members of the coastal tribes, with the result that details of procedure vary at every ceremony according to the prerogatives of the donor. Since 1910, the influence of white civilization has increased to such an extent that nusuk ceremonials have virtually been abandoned. This took place at a time when the ritual was in transition, a state of affairs which rendered difficult the collection of coherent information. A'alk dances are associated with nusuk, but the addition of new features to the latter was accompanied by a decay of the former. Both societies have now almost ceased to exist, but whereas the nusuk organization was abandoned during a period of change and accretion, that

177 of the a'alk came to an end when it was already waning in 535 importance. It was impossible to obtain as much detailed 575 information about the latter as was desired, and it is even 128 possible that some of the facts recorded in connection with tsaak ceremonial really belong to a'alk rites.

The right to perform an a'alk dance depends upon a duly 424 validated ancestral prerogative of which the obvious mark is 535 an a'alk name. Some of the first people brought down such 575 designations and dances with them from above in the beginning of time, a few were acquired on this earth as gifts from super-
[173] natural beings. Those who have rights of this kind form a loose organization which may be termed the a'alk society. This is closely associated both with the tsaak society and with chiefs, owing to the occurrence of these three types of names in the same ancestral myths. One member of an ancestral [556] family may use his goods to validate his ancestral name, another to make himself a tsaak, a third to become an a'alk, and an important chief, endowed with ability and wealth, may be able to do all three.

A'alk dances are less spectacular than those of either the tsaak or kasiut societies, nor are rattles or whistles used. The prerogatives of a member are limited to his name, the right to perform a certain dance, and the use of a song which commonly describes some feature of his ancestral myth. Four types of dances are considered to be a'alk; the methods of acquiring and using any one of these are similar, so it is unnecessary to describe the differences before the actual account of the performance of each.

556 If there is a dormant a'alk prerogative in the ancestral 575 family of the donor of a potlatch, he usually chooses to validate this as one of the features of his ceremony. He first consults his wife and other relatives to ensure that sufficient goods will be forthcoming, and if this matter can be arranged satisfactorily, he chooses some young relative as the recipient of the dormant right. It would be most unusual for the youth selected to decline the honour. Or some man, other than the

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NEA Bellacoola NEA

holder of the potlatch, may wish to confirm a prerogative and requests the donor to allow this to take place at his ceremony. Permission is never refused, since the more incidental rites, the greater is the prestige of the whole. The young man on whom the name is to be confirmed is always told what is planned for him, and his relatives instruct him what to do. 551 575

As the time for the potlatch draws near, the donor requests the singers to prepare an a'alk song for the youth. The theme always deals with some incident of his ancestral story with which the singers are already familiar. If a number of youths are to be made a'alk, a song must be composed for each. The carpenters are also requested to make for the initiate one, or sometimes two, masks representing a supernatural being, either human or animal, connected with the myth in which occurs the a'alk name about to be conferred. The design is chosen by the senior members of the ancestral family concerned; it is usually, though not necessarily, the same as that employed by the last incumbent of the name. If the designation about to be confirmed is one which came down from above in the beginning of time, the mask usually represents the guise adopted by the first user of the name; if the prerogative were obtained on earth, it portrays the being from whom the right was received. These arrangements are made in secret, and are known only to the craftsmen, the donor of the potlatch, and his family. [533] 532 556 575

On the night of xlāxtnum, when the work for the potlatch is allotted, the youth who is to be made an a'alk is confined within the back-room of the house, presumably in company with the sisask initiates, though there is ambiguity on this point. After the general arrangements have been made, an elderly a'alk whose aid has been requested, suddenly rushes from the house as if he had heard some noise. One of the sisi, or an influential chief, makes some allegedly witty remark as to why he has gone out, and then follows, taking with him the dance head-dress belonging to the a'alk. This is identical with the type worn by sisask, one of the many points of resemblance 556 575 [184] [535]

532 between the two sections. Presently the elderly a'alt returns, 595 clad in his ceremonial costume consisting of the head-gear, a [184] blanket, and a narrow apron from which hang deer hooves, [242] small pieces of copper, or other jingling articles. The singers [535] strike up his song, and he dances near the fire in a manner depending upon which of the four dances he has the right to perform. Again the ski leaves the house; when he returns he announces that a tutsiwas is coming with a song for the youth, naming the one who is to be made an a'alt. A moment passes, and in walks a masked figure depicting the form taken by the first ancestor of the novice, or the being from which one of his later forefathers received an a'alt prerogative. Sometimes two of these beings appear. The apparition circles the fire, stops beside the singers, and chants a song to them in a low voice. Then it enters the back-room and is seen no more. Presently the singers strike up the song they have just heard. To those who are neither a'alt nor nuxnl it seems that the song was brought by the supernatural visitor; in reality, it is the one previously composed by the singers and taught by them to the wearer of the mask to lend realism to the performance. The youth concealed within the back-room does not emerge on this occasion, the song is merely sung in practice. Sometimes the masked figure appears during the daytime and walks openly along the shore of the river like a foreign guest, as indeed it is said to be.

The coming of a tutsiwas is one of the points of resemblance between a'alt and nuxnl rites. The older people agree
[184] that this has long been a feature of the former society, adopted
[198] by the latter in recent years. The description given to this section appears to be of the original and proper use, although, as already noted, the nuxnl have recently employed tutsiwas for somewhat different purposes.

It is uncertain whether or not the a'alt novice remains secluded any longer within the back-room. In ancient times he probably did, but with the recent growth of the nuxnl society and decline of the a'ak, concealment has become limited to initiates of the former organization.

No more a'ak dances take place during the potlatch proliferation, but with the coming of the first group of foreign guests, the host displays as many types of dance as he is entitled to, including a'ak if he has the necessary prerogative. On this occasion other a'ak, especially relatives of the dancer, give their dances, the only time that such are used at potlatches except by novices receiving names. This is repeated on the arrival of every party of guests.

Meanwhile the novice, or novices, has been practising the proper steps for his appearance, which always occurs immediately before the entry of the masked figure representing the dancer's dead relative. As already mentioned, there are four kinds of a'ak dances, known as ma'ma'ak' ha'yahum, q'ayu, and ow'ha'a. A similar song is used for a dance of any one of these four; the two dances some small incident of the ancestral myth in which the name occurs, such as the bringing down of the prerogative by the first incumbent in the beginning of time. At the proper moment, the singers beat time and the audience joins them in singing it. Then the singers begin to strike rapidly on the floor with double boxes, assisted by the guests who clap their hands in rapid couplets. Out comes the dancer, resplendent in his head-dress decorated with sound skins, and women with the required prerogative begin to dance. If his prerogative is as a ha'yahum or q'ayu, he proceeds to a place beside the fire and begins to run around it, novices, in short mincing steps, crouching at the same time on himself. He clasps his hands behind his back and bends down, then stands upright with palms extended upwards, never ceasing to move his feet in rapid steps. This type of dance is far more violent than a sound one, and the amount of energy expended by a dancer in his rapid circuits of the fire is tremendous. Never, even for a moment, are his feet quiet, while his body twists and bends in an amazing fashion. After two or three rounds he retires utterly exhausted. The first heaven-ner for a waqpaal or ow'ki'a dancer is the same. He too comes near the fire and at first dances in the same manner until the singers in unison hallow out, Hi'ai, "Move." With a run that ends in a crashing leap that seems to shake the floor, the performer takes his position between the fire and one of the side walls and begins to revolve furiously upon himself. His body is bent forward until it seems as if all that prevents him from falling to the floor is his hands clenched together as far as possible behind his back; while his feet move so rapidly that the short mincing steps run into each other. Gradually the hooting becomes less violent, only to be followed by another cry of Hi'ai, and another rush and jump that lands the dancer behind the fire. Then he revolves once more in the same furious fashion, the same is repeated on the side of the fire opposite to the place where he first performed, and finally between the fire and the door. Waqpaal and ow'ki'a are the most strenuous of all Bella Coola dances and the performer is glad to retire. He afterwards joins the audience.

Among the supernatural beings, the naqaw' is a puzzling anomalous gem.

This dance entails no taboo or restrictions on the dancer.

This terminates the performance of this type of dance at a potlatch, but among the goods distributed are some to validate the name acquired by the dancer, and others to legalize his actual display.

The occasions on which importance and solemnity are attached to a'alt dances is during potlatches, but they are also given at other times. When Bella Coola performances are to waqpaal in the presence of the supernatural that the [illegible] end of the hacha season and before the salmon come to the rivers, dances for pleasure are of common occurrence. A xaxal can call his fellows to his house and the singers hear our xaxal songs to which the owners dance, but the most common hosts are a'alt. Of course an individual may be a member of both societies, but the hostess invite the guests in his a'alt name. These occasions include both members of the society and those who are not. Any o'alk, provided that he has enough food for a meal, can call in his neighbours, but the one who usually does so is a man who has received his name a year or two before the occasion.

A few days before the time selected, the host asks the singers to compose a new song for him. For a waxpul dancer particularly, and in some cases for any one of the other three divisions of the society, the song does not deal with incidents connected with the host's ancestral story, but with humorous or disgraceful incidents of the present time. If a man has caught an salmon and keps them all for himself, his miserliness is commented upon in the song; if a wife has deserted her husband for another man, the actions of the two are mercilessly ridiculed; if a chief has failed to display generosity in a likewise recorded, and reference is made to seven in dance ritual. To do this is one of the functions of a waxpul, and the singers are always ready to assist him. At the same time they often add a new incident to the song belonging to some other o'alk dancer so that he too will be able to perform. In this way the songs are transferred from year to year, which is different from the customary Bella Coola usage.

On the morning of the day chosen, the host asks one of the singers to beat a drum repeatedly but slowly, as a signal that a non-ceremonial dance is about to take place. Almost soon, heralds go from house to house announcing who is to give the dance. In the late afternoon the people gather in the dancer's house where men, women, and children sort themselves without distinction of rank, the only reserved place being that for the singers behind the fire. They beat out the host's name and he dances to it, while the singers themselves sing the words to the amusement of the audience. Using their own discretion, they then beat out the name of another o'alk and he also dances, followed in succession by a third, a fourth, and as many as the singers think fit. Sometimes the songs of round are used in a similar manner. When many have danced, the host distributes food to all his guests, not forgetting to give the largest presents to the singers and heralds who have rendered assistance. Instead of dispersing immediately, the guests may remain to gamble or wrestle. Since there is no solemnity attached to the affair, it is a time for indulgence in amusements of all kinds. These conclude the chief features of the a'alk dances. Probably they once played an important part in the lives of the Bella Coola, but with the increase in importance of the nuaxt, they have decayed into little more than a form of entertainment.

A'alk origin myths

Theoretically, every Bella Coola a'alk should be able to record the myth in which his name is embodied, but few can do so. Of course if a man has been able to validate both ancestral and a'alk names from the same myth, that is his authorization for both. In many cases a myth is split, and the portion containing an a'alk appellation is given to some member of the ancestral family, other than the chief able to validate the most important ancestral name. In such a case, the a'alk can record little more than that his designation came down with a specified group of the first people. This, for example, is the explanation given by a Kimsquit nuxpual for his name Sunaklelle which came to earth with Smaxae (I, p. 331) in the beginning of time. Another Kimsquit a'alk, Tlaiyakaw, whose prerogative is to perform the dance of that name, states that it was brought down by Sinaqut (I, p. 316), who assumed the designation of Tlaiyakaw after its performance. This early settler had the additional name of W'ialas.

The two following origin myths were obtained in some detail:

Once,[1] long, long ago, Hagunim came to the conclusion that it was not good for the inhabitants of the world to be afraid of supernatural beings. He decided that the best way to dispel this dread would be to arrange a marriage between his daughter, Sawaw-a, and a mortal; so he 539 to climb up to visit his grandfather. Ts'ooxw did not discourage him, so his son began the ascent and soon disappeared from sight. In course of time he reached the land above and made his way to his grandfather, Ałquntsw, who was delighted to see him. He told his visitor that he was weary of constantly carrying the sun's light, and asked him to relieve [821] him of the duty for a time. He mentioned that on previous occasions when his wife had acted as his substitute, she, being a woman, had been shy and had hidden herself behind clouds. The boy was willing to undertake the task and listened to his grandfather's instructions; in the morning he was to use only one fire stick, a little later, two, then three, and, finally, four at midday. In the afternoon he was to decrease the number in a manner corresponding to the morning's increase."

Next day Ałquntsw went away for a holiday after entrusting his grandson with the precious fire sticks. As soon as he was alone, the malicious youth began to pile one after another on the fire, until people in the world far below were wakened at dawn by the suffocating warmth. Ts'ooxw's son threw on log after log, each increasing the heat below. The earth began to sizzle, and finally burst into flames, and the water boiled in the rivers and ocean. Tsooxw had realized what must be the matter as soon as she felt the great heat, so she went outside and rubbed her hand over the planks on her house. Thus protected, those within survived, although all other human beings perished. Most of the animals [825] escaped by hiding, though the weasel failed to conceal the tip of its tail which was burnt black, a characteristic inherited by all weasels ever since. Ałquntsw felt the heat and hurried home.

"You have done great harm to mortals," he burst out angrily. "Henceforth you shall live on earth as a mink."

[825] Ałquntsw seized his grandson and cast him to earth in this guise.

539 The survivors of the catastrophe multiplied until the whole world 551 was repeopled from the single household. Each of them took an s'alt 575 name from the burning, and these have been transmitted from one to another of the descendants of each until this day. One of them, a sacqual name, is Sałqlaxum, "The Increase of the Sun's Heat through the Addition of Fire Sticks"; another, a Sałqałkum, sanakamulnic, "The Track of the Sun"; a third, Skaul, "The Charred Portion of a Half-Consumed Log."

539 The following Kimsquit story* describes the obtaining of 575 an s'alt prerogative in the distant past.

Long ago, there lived in Kimsquit a young chief who was a great hunter. On one occasion, he was camping in a cave, Anskelwhlis, on the mountains when not only its roof, but the dome of the sky as well, opened so that he was able to gaze into the upper regions of space. From this manifestation of the supernatural, he took for himself the name Alhwi, "The Opening of the Upper Regions," and validated it by giving valuable presents. This name has been transmitted from generation to generation and was recently brought to the present owner by his wife. With it is the prerogative of distributing potlatch gifts outside the house since the first Alhwi claimed that the sky itself was his only ceiling.

A few years after Alhwi had had this experience, he and his three brothers left Kimsquit by canoe to hunt mountain goats at Zawelk. To their surprise, a gull perched on the bow of their canoe; they did not scare it away, thinking it indicated a manifestation of the supernatural. At intervals it left its perch and circled around the canoe, but soon returned. As they neared the landing-place, the gull flew ashore and changed into a yearling mountain goat. Alhwi told his brothers, of whom the second was named Alhcoa and the third O'wistl, that he believed this to be a further visitation of the supernatural to himself and that he would investigate it, and later meet them at Anskelwhlis.

Alhwi leapt ashore and followed the yearling goat. Wherever the road was rough, his strange guide travelled slowly so that his human companion could follow him. At length they came to a deep chasm with sheer walls about six feet apart, and a ledge running along one side. Alhwi followed the goat along this, until the animal leapt across the gorge, struck the face of the precipitous rock, and vanished. It was clear that he had passed into the interior of the mountain and the chief could hear the distant sound of a drum.

"I can do but once," he said to himself.

Then the brave hunter leapt across the chasm, struck the rock, and passed through it as if it had been tissue paper, to find himself in a vast cavern amid a large number of people. These were really animals who had gathered to await the coming of his guide, the yearling goat. The latter told him not to be afraid, that henceforth he would be under the protection of all animals and would not come to harm, no matter how often he hunted. With breathless interest, Alhwi watched the performance of a sacred dance, for every yearling goat is a supernatural dancer of this type. The ceremony lasted throughout the night, and next morning he set out for Anskelwhlis, not realizing that it was really a year since he had left his brothers.

Meanwhile, though the three brothers had almost despaired of their elder's safe return, they patiently remained at their post, and after a year were overjoyed to see smoke rising from Anskelwhlis. They hurried

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948

530 to the cave and greeted their long-lost brother affectionately. Though
575 he, too, was delighted at the reunion, he said but little, and for two days told them nothing of his experiences. They remained in camp and on the third night Ałwi told his brothers that he had obtained supernatural hunting powers. The following morning the four went out and killed so many mountain goats that the cave was filled with their carcasses. Their good fortune was amazing. Ałwi sent one of his brothers to invite to the cave not only the people of Kimsquit but of the whole countryside as well. While he was absent on this errand, the remaining three prepared and smoked the meat, taking care to preserve the leg bones.

Within two weeks the guests began to assemble. Ałwi's house was a good place for a ceremony because Ałwi had decorated it with paintings after its roof had opened to show him the upper regions of space.* When all the people had arrived, the host gave a mountain goat leg-bone to each, asking every recipient to beat time with it. Then Ałwi danced [535] a waqwal dance, imitating the one he had seen done by the goat. After performing, he unfolded the story of his adventures and finished by giving away valuable presents of smoked meat and goat grease. Thus was initiated this particular waqwal dance.

In later years, Ałwi had such phenomenal success in hunting that [551] by distributing the spoil he was able to create and confirm for his youngest brother the name, Nuxhwmalkwal, "The One Who is Always Successful." This has since been transmitted from one generation to another. Ałwi, [103] too, is responsible for the name of Mount Tsqinxtil, "Leg-Bones." On one occasion he killed a large number of mountain goats on the mountain and left their leg-bones, tsqinxtil, piled together near the spot. He instructed everyone to refer to the mountain by that name, which has since been done.

EARLY HISTORY OF THE SOCIETY

575 A few words should be said about the reputed early history
578 of the a'alt society. Its members seem always to have been on the best of terms with the xaaxa, and there is no mention of feuds between these two organizations. On the other hand, there is said to have been constant friction with members of the łaxtai society.* The latter comprises a large number of individuals bound together by the possession of supernatural [532] *These paintings are said to be still in existence, and the owner of one inheritance claimed to have seen them.

*This point is elaborated in vol. II, chap. 4.

patrons and claiming to possess supernatural powers. In contrast to the a'alk, the kwiat are well organized and regulated; its members are proud of their powers, and scornful of those who lack the same. Under these circumstances, it is not difficult to understand jealousy between the two. Until relatively recent times, the a'alk were numerically stronger, and included some chiefs, whereas the strength of the kwiat society depended on the supernatural strength claimed by its members. It is true that individuals occasionally belonged to both, if they happened to possess prerogatives of both kinds, but, as a rule, the a'alk were young men and the kwiat were older people. This rivalry was formerly so intense that all who were not members of the latter society were often termed a'alk irrespective of whether or not they actually possessed dances of that type; Carrier Indians alone were not so designated. During the summer, members of the two societies dwelt amicably together, but during the winter, when dances took place, there were continual bickerings. The kwiat constantly endeavoured to impress their rivals with their own prowess; while the a'alk, not convinced of the others' power, used to mock them in their songs. This was the usual practice in case of some error in kwiat ritual. The a'alk frequently disobeyed the orders of the kwiat and a number of them once tried to pry up a huge boulder beneath which was the "power" of a certain kwiat (II, p. 8). In recent years the kwiat society has entirely gained the supremacy, but it is agreed by all Bella Coola that in former years this was by no means the case, and that a'alk did not hesitate even to kill one of their rivals.

Miscellaneous Ceremonies

The rites described in this chapter and the one preceding comprise the potlatch of the Bella Coola so far as its details could be learnt. Until the increase of wealth in recent years, the potlatch was rare, and it is unlikely that in any village more than one month in the year was consumed in the

McIlwraith E-5 (922-1924) 1948

of each song dance to it. Anyone who has enough food to provide a meal for all is glad to invite his neighbours to such an affair, but the singers and heralds can force a stingy man to act as host. Everyone knows his neighbour's resources and the singers have no hesitation in going to the house of a man with an ample supply of food and beginning to beat out songs there. The heralds are quick to see what is happening and call the people, with the result that the involuntary host is compelled to provide a meal in order not to be thought mean and churlish. Without waiting for the singers to take the initiative, heralds likewise often invite people to the house of a man whom they know to be well provided with food.

During the summer, the necessity of laying in supplies of salmon makes it impossible to hold many dances, although one of the non-sacred type just described takes place whenever there is a lull in fishing. In the early autumn, when berries, fish, and game are abundant, the thoughts of chiefs turn to potlatches and the lengthy preliminaries are begun. At this season, too, a chief who lacks sufficient wealth to invite foreign guests, calls in his neighbours for a tsaask dance and initiates some of his young relatives into that society. The ritual, described in the last chapter, resembles that of a potlatch except that no new house is constructed, there is no return of a dead relative, and the ceremonial connected with the coming of foreigners is necessarily omitted. In some cases a chief performs this type of rite a year before he proposes to hold a potlatch, and explains that he is doing so because he will be unable to give presents to the inhabitants of his own village at the later affair. Gifts so distributed are returnable with interest, though it is not obligatory for recipients to do this in time for the donor to make use of their repayment at his potlatch.

Ceremonials of this nature occupy the Bella Coola during the early autumn, while in winter kwiat dances take place almost nightly. When they are over, it is time for the non-sacred variety of adult performances, and for another type of rite, nusaxlmx.

presents were distributed to validate the name, Ťisiyăkam, which Sinuqul had chosen for himself. 539*

Sinuqul married a Bella Bella woman who brought with her the prerogative of a dance with respect to the devil-fish. In Bella Bella this rite was connected both with the kusiut and the nuxuk, but in Kimsquit it was performed only as a kusiut dance. It was first given there by Łulqmun-i, a relative of Sinuqul, and has since been performed in like fashion in Kimsquit. Their daughter received the Bella Bella name, Yoltsu, which has since remained in Kimsquit. [424] [575] [535] [551]

ORIGIN MYTH OF Ăqul-i[*]

In the beginning of time there came to Ăqul-i, on the east side of the Dean River, about one mile from the sea, Senewatkx and his three younger brothers. They brought a stone hammer as their present from Ăłqwuttăm. After they had lived some time on this earth, Senewatkx asked Yultsimut to have a canoe ready for him on the morrow. By the next day Yultsimut had completed a fine craft. Senewatkx was delighted and spent four days fitting it out; then set out with his three younger brothers for a trip to the far north, where he knew by report that abalone-shells were to be found.[*] The four did not know the route and were constantly penetrating into fiords from which there was no exit; however, they persevered and were helped by all whom they encountered, Senewatkx's name being well known. After a month's voyage, they reached their goal. They found themselves before a lofty precipice falling sheer into the ocean with a cavern visible in it at very low tide. This they boldly entered. At first they were deluged with falling star-fish; in fact, their canoe would have been sunk by the weight of these if the youngest brother had not held up his cedar-bark cloak to ward them off. A little farther on they found countless abalone-shells, with which they swiftly filled the canoe, fearing lest the tide should rise sufficiently to prevent their return if they stayed to investigate further. Once safely outside they camped, and the eldest brother took the opportunity to bestow names on the younger brothers for things they had seen or done on the way. He called his second brother Nuxwis-dzap, "The Warrior," as if he had fought against the abalone; the third Ałac-łimăx, "Falling Star-Fish," and the youngest Ałaqwa, "The Road-Maker," a reference to the

Other people had come down to earth at the same time as Kásta-a, and among them a man and his wife who had landed at the mouth of Gas Bay. They had two daughters who, walking one day at the head of the bay, were surprised to find a house. They looked in and saw a woman, so entered, and laughed heartily to find her made of rotten wood. They kicked over the figure and the head fell into the fire and was burnt. Then they seated themselves in her place, worked diligently at the blanket and ate a large amount of the food. Towards dusk they put the figure back in place and hid themselves. BB 539 BC 539 *

Soon Kásta-a entered. He embraced the figure, called her a good wife, and thanked her for weaving so diligently and for having eaten so much of the food. Then he saw that she had burnt her head, and chided her, saying that she must take better care of herself. At this the two girls who were hiding burst out laughing and showed themselves. They suggested to Kásta-a that he choose one of them for his wife; he agreed, selected the older and married her. He built a house on a hilltop where they lived and to which he called people from far and near when he gave a potlatch.

Sláná Origin Myths

As already stated, many sláná names are believed to have come down from above with the first Bella Coola, or to have been created by them on this earth. In such cases, the sláná origin myth is the same as the ancestral myth. Theoretically, names of the same type can also be received through visions in which a beholder is given his new designation by some supernatural being, or taken it from the apparition. In either case, of course, it must be duly validated by the giving of presents. Only three myths were obtained which deal solely with the acquisition of a sláná prerogative. No doubt this is chiefly to be explained by the fact that most sláná rites have been derived from the Bella Bella. BC 773 551 575 [787] [556] [177]

A Sunet Sunsk MYTH

It is doubtful whether the following tradition is a true nusk myth or merely an explanation for a dramatic performance carried out at potlatches. 534* 575

About 1880 a man of Sunet was made a shaman by the supernatural being Tlaqmai-ks, a woman who normally lives in the land above. She is made almost entirely of copper so that whenever she walks there is the sound of clashing metal. The visionary was given the shaman's name of Sunsskila. It was not generally known how he obtained his power, but as his wealth increased in an amazing manner, it was assumed that he must have received something from Tlaqmai-ks which, kept in his box, acted as a magnet to wealth.*

Sunsskila laid down four laws for behaviour in his house, which were obeyed, since he was a person of influence both as a shaman and as a man of wealth. He said that Tlaqmai-ks had instructed him in the following:

(1) No bread was to be taken from the central fire, lest the supernatural men who were watching it should be offended at the removal.

(2) No menstrual woman was to be allowed within the house.

(3) No pounding of cedar-bark was to be allowed within the house.

(4) Since his power was in some manner connected with the fire he decreed that while his songs were being sung, there was to be no obstruction of any kind between the singers and it. Accordingly, they did not arrange themselves in the usual circle, but sat in a row with a sloping mat stretched between them and the fire, as if it were a connecting causeway.

Whenever Sunsskila gave a dance, six holes were cut through the wall of the back-room, at a height of about seven feet from the floor. While actually dancing, six assistants pulled ropes down through these holes one to his hand, in time to the music. Moreover, instead of standing on the floor, Sunsskila used to perform within a large box, which concealed him below the thighs and which was moved to and fro by assistants, as if it had been on castors. After dancing in time to two songs, a metallic clashing would be heard, without any Sunsskila would not drop, returning with a small, naked girl whose clothing was entirely covered with tiny copper ornaments. She represented Tlaqmai-ks. Sunsskila

A BELLA BELLA flood MYTH*

Years ago, when white men first came to the coast, a schooner was surprised and captured by some unkwy Indians near whose village it was anchored in Johnstone Channel. The crew was massacred with the exception of one man who crawled ashore on a mooring rope; his name was given as Kimpa, probably an attempt to pronounce Campbell. For over a year he was hunted by the unkwy people without success, and it was assumed that he must have died. Four years later, however, a Bella Bella canoe was cautiously rounding a point when the bow man saw a strange figure collecting clams. He went ashore armed with his musket and stalked the creature, which turned out to be the white man, clad in woven bark and moss. The latter made friendly signals, and the Bella Bella treated him kindly, giving him food and clothing. He remained with them for years and learnt their language. On one occasion when his rescuers' supply of powder was exhausted, this man said that he was going away, and left early one morning at high tide, to return to the schooner with some powder he had made himself. He refused to share with the Bella Bella his knowledge of how to make it, but kept them well supplied, and also furnished much game. When at length a white man's craft came to Bella Bella the survivor sent a message written in charcoal on cedar wood to the captain, and he was taken off. Presents were given to his rescuers for their kindness in aiding him, as well as a paper setting forth the particulars of their friendliness to the whites.

Many years later the son of Kimpa's rescuer made a cured totem, and used a mask representing the white man. The myth used in connection with it told of the manner in which the father of the donor had found a strange creature who brought him good fortune, first by providing him with powder, and then by bringing him into friendly relations with the white man. The only innovent part of the rite was the postponement of its inauguration until many years after the event.

If this tale has an historical basis, it must be assumed that the survivor of the massacre had been able to conceal some powder which he claimed to have made in order to increase his reputation.

ceived information of the proposed marriage, but they always plead ignorance, and deliberate for several days. Y's parents and other relatives take part in the discussion, and Y herself may likewise be taken into confidence. Although a daughter has, theoretically, little choice, in practice she exercises a great deal of influence. Her mother and father weigh the suitor's eligibility not only with regard to wealth and ancestral possessions, but consider his character. An immoral young man is not desirable, though neither is one who is impotent.

If Y's relatives agree to the proposal, some one of them informs the intermediary, or X's father, and the young people are considered to be engaged. The fact is supposed to be kept secret for several days, although the news usually becomes known sooner. X's relatives as soon as possible take a number of presents to Y's family. These are given in private, and are termed "secret gifts"; they are said to give strength to the future children. Since no witnesses are present it follows that no social prestige accrues from the transaction. The relatives included in the "family" of either X or Y are not always the same; uncles, aunts, grandparents, may or may not take part in the giving and receiving of presents, the parents alone always do so. Sometimes distant relatives take a leading part in the arrangements, either in hope of receiving valuable gifts, or of obtaining social influence by lavish gifts. If X's relatives have reason to believe that Y's family will accept their proposal, several of them may go in company and actually carry the "secret gifts" to Y's house at the time of making the first proposal. Should this be rejected, they merely carry away their goods, and as the affair has been private, no one's vanity is hurt.

The acceptance of "secret gifts" binds the engagement of X and Y, but a few days elapse before this is made public. If X's family is wealthy, his father, or other near relative, presently invites all the inhabitants of the village to his house. The singers, in their usual sections behind the fire, strike up the tune of some feastsong and the owner of the song, thus warned, dances in time to it. Using their own discretion, the musicians proceed to beat out the time for kusiut after kusiut, and each performs. In like fashion they then beat out the tune of one [535] nusek after another, and each member of that society gives his [575] dance. Since none of the supernatural beings is present, the affair is non-sacred. The singers consult with the host as to the number of songs to be used. When they stop at last, X's father, aided by his younger relatives, gives valuable presents [518] of food. No mention of the coming marriage is made, but the rite gives the donor an opportunity of displaying his generosity as a chief and indirectly increases the importance of the wedding because the value of the food will later be remembered in connection with it.

If X's father is very wealthy, he may recall the people for several nights, always providing the same type of entertainment, and always giving food. He uses his own judgment as to the number of such entertainments, but at that which he decides shall be the last, he announces:

"Tomorrow we shall go to Y's father's house."

If X's father does not wish to give away such large quantities of food he may omit the dancing in his own house and make this announcement at a potlatch, a kusiut dance,[1] or any other public gathering. But the more elaborate the ceremonial, the greater is the importance of the marriage in the eyes of the Bella Coola, which in turn increases the strength of the children [158] who may result from it.

On the morning after this declaration, X's father calls to 518 his house those whom he wishes to be witnesses of the alliance 584 that has been planned. These include as many of his relatives and those of his wife as he desires, and often intimate friends. These individuals comprise the group interested, on behalf of X, in the marriage; they provide the goods which are given for him, and receive the presents from the corresponding group of Y's relatives. Anyone having the necessary financial ability

old man came back to Bella Coola with his son, a man about twenty-five years of age. During his absence all his relatives had died, and he was forgotten. He went to the house of a man with whom his ancestors had intermarried generations ago, explained who he was, and was welcomed. The old man and his son have since lived there, although it is doubtful if the owner of the house had ever heard of their existence, and the son cannot even speak the Bella Coola language. 602 476

X and Y themselves are not entirely overlooked in the exchange of presents between their two families. If Y's father is well pleased with his son-in-law he may show this not only publicly, which redounds to his own credit, but by the communication of secret love such as a special number of nights for ceremonial chastity. Conversely, if Y should not be a tsaciut, her father-in-law often asks her father's permission to make her a member of that society. The woman's father is naturally pleased and makes no objections; so she is initiated, using a name and prerogative embodied in her husband's family. Commonly too, they give her one of their ancestral names at any convenient ceremony later than the wedding. In conformity with the rules already explained, if Y should die childless the names return to X's relatives, but if there are children they pass to them. It is said that nuxsé names can never be transferred in this manner. 606 491 425 [715] [575] [553] [575]

Y's father and other relatives continue to take an interest in her ceremonial welfare and in her personal comfort. If X beats or otherwise abuses her, they expostulate; and if his cruelty becomes unbearable they shelter their daughter when she runs away from her husband. If X should murder Y, she would be avenged by her family. Only one instance of this was known, when the murderer avoided his pursuers by fleeing from the country. As a rule a wife is fairly well treated, though this depends on the character of the husband, the importance of her relatives, and the amount of goods expended to validate the marriage. Among slaves and persons of no influence, it is assumed that a husband may sell his wife as a 593 [602] [627] [567] [432] [418]

this rite is neglected no more salmon will come to the river. No precautions are necessary after the food has been digested. 764 [725]

Many men prepare their coffins before death. If this has not been done, a large, wooden box is provided by a kinsman of the deceased. The body is dressed in good clothing and bound into a squatting position, head between knees, hands clasped around shins, and the haunches just above the level of the soles of the feet. In this posture it is thrust into the coffin. Particularly if the corpse has been brought from some distance and rigor mortis has set in, it may be necessary to break the back-bone and even to crush the skull before the box can be closed. A stone is placed on the back of the neck, within the coffin, to prevent the ghost from returning to haunt the survivors. A little choice food is placed beside the body of a dearly loved child for nourishment during the journey to the next world. [763] [602] [775]

From this point onwards, the funeral rites differ according to the rank of the deceased. On the death of an influential xaxa, the senior members of that society meet as soon as possible to arrange the dramatization of the coming of Malakila. A xaxa son, brother, or other near relative is always present even if he has little importance in the affairs of the society. If the death has taken place during the night, the conference is held the following morning and the rites begin at noon. There may be delay until all have gathered, but about the middle of the first possible day two xaxa are sent up one of the mountains behind the village. They carry large, cone-shaped whistles which they blow twice. The sound is plainly audible in the village and all, whether or not members of the xaxa society, recognize that a supernatural being is drawing near. After a short interval, another whistle is blown by a xaxa concealed on the roof of the house in which the corpse is lying, and after another pause the same sound comes from within, beside the body itself. Most of the collaborators know that this is the voice of Malakila (also called Xexispuxum), 775 966 [776] but even if unaware of the fact, they realize that some supernatural, invisible visitor has arrived.

Heralds go from house to house, and sometimes to adjacent villages as well,[1] inviting the people to pay a farewell visit to the dead man who will soon leave them; in this invitation the nuxnt name of the deceased is used. The guests assemble at once, irrespective of their rank or membership in the nuxnt society. To mark their grief, female relatives pull out tufts of their hair, and both men and women of the immediate family cut their hair short. The body, either in its coffin or covered with blankets, is placed between the central fire and the back-room, immediately behind the place where the singers take their stations. When all are present, a son or other near relative who is also a fluent speaker, stands up and expounds how the Chief, meaning Malakila, has come to visit the dead man, and how all should try to understand the song he has brought.[2] A hidden nuxnt has been blowing a whistle intermittently, and the singers pretend to be able to understand words of a song in its notes. In reality they have prepared in advance the new one which they now beat out, accompanied by their voices. The theme either describes the coming of the supernatural visitor, or recounts the number of potlatches given by the deceased, and the manner in which these will make smooth the path whither he is going in the same way that distributed goods validate a chief's seat in this world. This song is practised and improved upon amid the booming of the whistle as if the singers were constantly gaining new ideas and embellishments from the words of the supernatural visitor. Sometimes a few incidents are added from the nuxnt myth. After several repetitions, a relative of the dead man asks the singers to beat out the latter's nuxnt songs, as many of them as are remembered from the time he was first initiated into the society. These are given several times, serving to recall the 533 ceremonies in which the chief took part during his life. At 575 intervals, the new song is repeated and nuxalk members of the 766 audience join in as they become familiar with the words. Frequently one or more relatives of the deceased dance in his [535] stead during the singing. The details of this rite, especially of the songs used at it, differ considerably according to the actions of the person during life; if a mighty chief, the donor of many potlatches, this fact is described in the song, whereas only an incident from the ancestral myth can be used for a young nuxalk. If some of his female relatives are professional [767] wailers, they function during the ceremony. In all circumstances, the rite aims to comfort the grieving kinsmen, an end which it usually achieves.

[1] The Bella Bella are said to invite foreign guests to this ceremony.

[2] Sometimes the people are grouped where the singing of Malakila, heralded by whistling and a drumming on the roof, takes place. There are variations in this, as in all other nuxnt rites.

As already described, nuxalk ceremonial was in a state of 575 transition at the time of the coming of the white man. Pre- 766 vious to that date, a spectacular funeral prerogative had been 177 adopted from Rivers Inlet,[8] which has since been claimed by a 424 number of nuxalk. All the Bella Coola know of this ceremony, and most of them desire to perform it at the death of a dearly [178] loved relative; at the present time this is possible owing to the slight regard paid to prerogatives, but it is certain that a few years ago it would have been forbidden to most people, and that it was never a universal Bella Coola rite.

When this rite is performed, the corpse is allowed to remain 575 in its coffin for at least one night after the day on which 766 Mulukhila came and the nuxalk songs were sung. Meanwhile the carpenters have prepared an imitation body, usually of 532 rags on a light framework, and a wooden representation of the deceased's crest. Since this figure is to come through the roof and carry aloft the corpse, stout hooks are attached to its feet.
In theory, the bird or animal disguise used by the first ancestor

[8] One old Bella Coola stated that this prerogative was obtained during his own lifetime from a Rivers Inlet chief who moved to Tal'ds. It is impossible to state accurately when this ritual was adopted by the Bella Coola, though it is unquestionably of recent origin.

575 766 [532] of the deceased, traced patrilineally, should come for the body, but this is difficult to arrange in case of whale, bear, and other marine or land mammals. Consequently, it has been customary to use only raven or eagle for this purpose, and it is assumed that at least one of these birds is present in the ancestral history of every individual as a result of the marriage of some of his forbears with a woman possessing one of these crests.[1] It is a common practice for an influential nusek to prepare a figure of this kind during his life-time and tell a son or other trusted relative where it has been hidden; if this has been done, it obviates the necessity of carpenters manufacturing one at short notice.

Several days are often required to complete these arrangements, but on the first evening possible, which may be two or three days after the death, the people are summoned to the dead man's house. The singers take their usual positions behind the fire and beat out the song used at the mourning ceremony already described; then, as on that occasion, they follow it with a number of the deceased's nusek songs. Once more they strike up the one newly composed and, as it is proceeding, whistling is heard, accompanied by the screaming of an eagle or the croaking of a raven. Those who are not members of the nusek society do not understand that these sounds are produced by hidden members blowing whistles on the roof. There is a crash on the planking and, through a space opened by the removal of several boards, the face of the bird crest can be seen peering in. It is a dramatic spectacle and the audience gasps appreciatively, especially those who see in it a manifestation of the supernatural, testifying to the importance of the deceased. If the stage management has been accurate, the figure appears at the termination of the song, but if it has arrived during the actual singing, the singers beat time slowly and cease to use their voices. The eagle, or raven, keeps squealing repeatedly and gradually comes through the hole in the roof, ponderously and slowly, until its talons grip the "body." In the same gradual fashion it carries this upwards until, just before the burden disappears through the roof, one of the principal singers leads his fellows and the audience in calling out: 575 766

[178] [1] The use of only raven or eagle is probably a degeneration due to recent decay of customs.

"Yo-," which has the significance of, "May you have a safe passage whence you came and whither you are going."

As soon as the bird has disappeared, its notes are heard from above, growing gradually fainter as the actors blow their whistles less violently. An eloquent naual stands up and expounds how the deceased's ovoat has come down from above to carry away his body, and often mentions incidents in the ancestral myth to explain why this bird had appeared. A young man is sent up to replace the roof boards and the hidden accomplices rejoin the audience unostentatiously. The corpse itself remains hidden in some back corner of the house where it was concealed at the time the dummy was seized, so that nothing indicates what has taken place.

The relatives must give presents to all who have witnessed this ceremonial prerogative. These are now distributed without regard to the rank of the recipient; such gifts are not returnable and are said to be, "What Has Been Shaken Off," like dust from the departing body. A meal, likewise provided by the kinsmen of the deceased, is now served, and as the people are eating, it is customary for senior naual to make laudatory speeches, extolling the dead chief and comforting the survivors by reminding them of the way in which he will be looked after in virtue of his ancestral traditions. This procedure may continue for several hours, and it is only when no one else wishes to speak that the people disperse. [552] [537]

It is not easy to comprehend the attitude of the Bella Coola to this rite. Some influential naual state emphatically that in former days it was possible to carry it out so realistically that the uninitiated were deceived, and never suspected that the actual corpse was later on buried in secret by the singers, carpenters, and naual. On the other hand, those who do not 575 766 781 wish to emphasize the importance of this society, were that the dumpline was always apparent, and that even the hooks and ropes by which the figure was manipulated could be seen. Still others regard the ceremony as a symbolic means of portraying the manner in which a man's crest comes to carry away his spirit and life. It seems clear that different interpretations must always have been accepted by different members of the community. A young and ingenuous initiated, steeped in the atmosphere of the supernatural, may well have believed that he was going upon an actual supernatural being, as the senior crest desired him to do; others must have recognized that a dumpline of some kind was being practised, but demonstration is such an important factor in Bella Coola life that individuals often disregard the difference between semblance and reality, and it is contrary to custom for a person to cast aspersions upon the prerogative of another. It is easy for such as one to accept the dumpline as a symbol or representation of the manner in which the crest carries off the intangible elements of the dead. This is certainly the attitude of the Bella Coola at the present time. Everyone realizes that the crest is of human manufacture and that the corpse itself is not carried away, but the rite is still performed and practised the survivors by giving them an opportunity to display their prerogative and the death of the deceased's ancestor.

Perhaps because of its relatively recent introduction, details of the performance of this rite are not fully standardized. In some cases, the crest is made to appear at the same time as Malakila, instead of at a subsequent ceremony. It is assumed that the origin of the rite is in some ancient myth in which the body was actually taken above by the crest, as are copied, with the aid of carpenters, by the descendants of the person to whom this occurred. There are no myths of this nature current in Bella Coola, although it is thought that such must have been common among the peoples of the same crest to explain the prevalence of the practice in that area. One old man mentioned that an Owikl myth in which a body became night-blown and was walled upwards in psychologically of the type which might serve as basis for a rite of this kind. If the descendants of the person to whom this had happened had demanded the incident or subsequent death, a custom analogous to the one here described would have arisen.

[illegible] OF THE DEAD

There is no fixed time for the disposal of a corpse. When possible, it takes place on the day following death, but as many as four days may elapse if delay is necessary for the performance of the rite just described. Another reason for postponement is the absence of near relatives; if they can be summoned within four to five days, the funeral may be delayed until their arrival. There is always endless discussion concerning the exact details, all relatives and members of the extended family take part, though the widow of a son, brother, or other near kinsman are chiefly followed. In this, as in many points of Bella Coola ritual, an influential chief often overrules the desires even of those who are more closely related to the deceased.

Should sunset the hour chosen,* usually about noon, and the people begin to assemble in the deceased's house, even strangers being welcome. Women wail intermittently, and another indication of the occasion is the bundle containing clothing, cooking utensils, and other articles belonging to the dead person. The lid of the coffin has been left open, but when everything is ready, an elderly man is asked to strike it, once, with a stone; then the lid is closed. Planks have been removed and a hole made in one of the front corners of the house, through which the men throw out the stone. The women redouble their lamentations as an old woman, previously asked to do so, lights a bundle of dried and undried cedar-bark and climbs through the opening carrying this. No request has been made for pall-bearers, but any strong man, especially and recompense to funeral assistants is usually delayed until their time. Such was often true even in former years, although poor people used to call their fellow-villagers together for the express purpose of publicly rewarding those who had helped to bury one of their relatives. It is probable that a ceremony of this kind was of a simple type. Another expedient is, and was, to give gifts to the grave-diggers and others at any convenient ceremony, such as a wife-second would dance. Indirectly mentioned, when the people have been called together for a ceremony, advantage is often taken of the gathering to settle debts or to perform one of an entirely different nature. It is probable that the announcing of graves solely to witness the payment of helpers was always unusual, or present in recent times. On these occasions when a body was buried in secret after the carrying away of a dummy figure by the men, the goods of the deceased were deposited in secret in the cemetery. Those who carried them were the men who had performed the secret interment, and when publicly recompensed for taking articles to the grave it was possible to increase the value of the gifts as reward for the hidden one without exposing the subterfuge.

Another type of ceremonial taking place after a funeral is the cleansing from the contamination of death of near relatives of the deceased, and of those who have handled the corpse. If spring waters or shallow are running, pall-bearers must not go near the river for ten days, or twenty according to some informants, after taking a body to the grave. They have become tainted with ceremonial uncleanness which, if brought to the river bank, would poison the waters. Unwillingness to become affected in this way led, on at least one occasion, to an elderly Dimdim dame being carried out to the cemetery by some old women who covered him with hands. The rules on grave-diggers cannot be removed, but ceremonially lapse after ten days.

The individual in greatest danger is the husband or wife whose consort has passed away. It is believed that Ob-ben

[176] new family. Confusion is probable only when a chief is [177] invested after he has stored up goods and made preliminary preparations for a potlatch; he may then carry out the rites intended, but designate the ceremony a memorial potlatch. There often, however, the affair is limited to rites associated with the deceased. Consequently, there is omission of the initiation of neophytes into the sacred and of all societies,* there is no establishment of new seats for young relatives of the [178] dead, and no strengthening of his own. It must be emphasized once more that there is no unalterable sequence of prescribed rituals at either potlatch or memorial potlatch; the omissions just mentioned are customary, not universal, and thus present the ritual of the two ceremonies in identical. Except on those rare occasions when invited at a potlatch, the return of a dead relative is the central feature of both.

[179] In recent years, the great increase in wealth has made it possible for a chief to perform a memorial potlatch soon after the death of an honored relative. This was rarely the case in former times, but as there was no other reason for which valuables were so ardently desired, every expedient was used to obtain the necessary goods. Occasionally, a chief happened to have the needful goods stored up so that he could give a memorial potlatch almost immediately. To such a fortunate individual the term, pamla, was applied, a word difficult to translate but combining the significances of rich, ready, fortunate, and reserved.

[180] Memorial potlatches, like those of the ordinary kind, are usually held in the early autumn, though occasionally one may be postponed until after the frosts season. When an intending donor has decided that he owns sufficient goods, he first calls to his fellow-chiefs and makes known his intentions, at the same time expounding in considerable detail the myths which he proposes to use as themes for mourning songs, and for other

*Performances of such rites at a memorial potlatch would be considered useful to the Bella Bella and were always resolved during the period when their influence was important.

(see Plate 45). So, too, wooden representations of coppers are often affixed to an upright post. Not only men are commemorated in this way, a father often places over his daughter's grave pictures of the goods used to rehay her from her husband; wooden plaques representing coppers are commonly used for this purpose.* Such symbols are usually cut down after a year owing to a vague feeling that it is not proper for them to remain standing too long. The function of this type of memorial is to mark the social status of the dead person as judged by the riches given away by him, or on his behalf, during his life-time. With the introduction of writing, the Bella Coola have been quick to recognize it as an easy means for recording the wealth distributed by a chief. In consequence, signs are often painted and erected, giving in figures a statement of his financial transactions. Another recent introduction has been the tombstone. One of these is often set up with the name of the deceased carved on it to perpetuate his memory, and a representation of his crest to record his ancestral history. Such a memorial combines the functions of the first and third types.

As the carpenters labour at the memorials, other arrangements for the ceremony present space. As at a potlatch, the fellow-villagers of the donor may be invited repeatedly to his house for the performance of sacred dances, but this feature is often omitted, especially if there are no employees to be invited. The mask to be worn by the deceased relative must be prepared in secret; or if several are to be commemorated at the single ceremony, one must be made ready for each. As the time drawn near, envoys are dispatched to invite foreign guests if it has been decided to have strangers present. This has been customary for many years, but during the period when no features of the potlatch were allowed at a memorial potlatch, the latter was sometimes carried out in the presence of the donor's fellow-villagers alone. The actual departure of the lowed the actor, blowing eagle down over him repeatedly. After one circuit of the hall, the performer passed out through the front door, from the vicinity of which was heard once more the large whistle and the screaming of the eagle, both growing less distinct as if the bird were flying away.

The wearer of the mask displayed considerable dramatic talent and succeeded in giving a realistic display in spite of the glaring lights which exposed his bare feet and betrayed the human handiwork of the mask in a manner impossible in the native type of house with a single, central fire as the sole illumination. The Carrier had worked the performance with zeamer, probably singed with cottonwoods, but to the Bella Coola it was no mere spectacle, it was a religious rite of the highest importance. All the spectators realized that the figure was human, but this mental incongruity in they gazed upon the representation of the dead woman in the form of her crest, to which they believed she had been transformed by death. Even the children were silent, and the only sound during the passage was the wailing of a sleepy infant. The eagle crest belonged to Jessie by virtue of membership in the ancestral family descended from her father's first ancestor, crest peculiarly, who had come to earth as Tsonai in the form of this bird. The blackfish was a crest acquired through her mother; the raven represented a copper raven belonging to an ancestral myth of the dying grandchild. In former times, carpenters would have worked for weeks preparing an elaborate composite figure, but Capsule Schooner wished no delay in the ceremony for fear of police interference, so that it was necessary to use what could happened to be in existence and to place them in conjunction by means of the crude white cloth. Jessie had not been initiated into the xaxai society, but no opposition was raised to the use of xaxai whistles both on account of her status as chief, and owing to the influence of her father who, a xaxai chief, found no restrictions and heeded no conventions. Besides, both her brothers were infe-social scandal. In former times it is certain that objections would have been raised to this breach of ceremonial privilege.

There was a pause for several minutes after the withdrawal of the figure. Then Boulton threw a copper on the floor in the track taken by the actor "to make home for the dead woman." A number of chiefs were forward to join the singers and discuss whether or not the copper should be enhanced. No one wished to do so, as Captain Schooner said he would have it fastened to a post over Jessie's grave, a proposition to which all agreed.

After interminable discussion in which Captain Schooner, Nakachakoomar, Boulton Schooner, Jim Pollard, and Abe Davis took the principal parts, it was decided to sing the fourth mourning song at this point. There was no reason why this should not have been done at the customary time, after the other dress, but wide latitude in detail was allowed in this ceremony; in fact, exact ritual never flourished in Bella Coola and has become increasingly rare in recent years. This song had been composed a number of years previously when Captain Schooner had called in the Bella Bella to a memorial potlatch, and great care had been expended on its composition owing to the skill of the guests in songs of this type. The words, altered to fit the circumstances, were phrased as if George and Dan were lamenting the loss of their mother and other relatives.

"O, we," they sang, "are thinking of our mother, our brothers, our sisters, our mother's brothers, our mother's sisters, our father's brothers, our father's sisters, of all our dead relatives. Please, ye chiefs from abroad, turn your hands, listen to our wail. You several great men, let us all cry together. It is we who have called you hither, look upon us."

This song was sung in the manner already described, except that more of the Bella Coola were familiar with the words and tune and could accordingly join in.

Meanwhile Captain Schooner, with his sons Boulton and Harry and his grandsons George Nelson and Andy Schooner, had been crouching in a corner of the hall, poring over the money which was to be distributed to validate the ceremony, occupants of the canoe, heard a roaring noise and saw a fish-weir, similar to those used by the Bella Coola, stretching across Burke Channel, which is about a mile and a half wide at this point. They were close to the beach and a brave went out a passage through the obstacle. A similar trap was once seen stretching across South Bentinck Arm.

An unusual apparition may be regarded as an omen of death. For example, not many years ago a young half-breed saw a motor-boat moored to the beach of North Bentinck Arm with an eagle seated in the stern. He ran his own motor-boat towards it, but as he approached the eagle became a man. This man he then still owner, never taking his eyes off the other boat, it, with its occupant, sank beneath the water, without leaving so much as a ripple. On relating the incident to his father, the latter recognized it as an omen of death. Six months later the half-breed's sister died, thus confirming her father's prognostication.

Supernatural Beings and Creatures in the Universe

Experiences such as have been cited in the last section are regarded as of possible, and not infrequent occurrence at the present time. On the other hand, supernatural old ground to them is misfortune, though it is the theme of many stories, is not considered as likely to happen now. The Bella Coola believe the narratives to be chronicles of actual events, and base their conceptions of many supernatural beings on their characteristics as therein described. There is no ceremonial significance attached to any of these stories; they may be, and are told by anyone, frequently for entertainment. Unquestionably, there is a feeling that the moral brought out in each tale is of value in admonishing the young people, though this point is never emphasized.

Supernatural old ground to an unfortunate person is normal acknowledgment. Power as obtained cannot be transferred by the recipient, although memory of the experience is [illegible] ceremonially presented to the chorus of a naxnox dance. The [illegible] is also somewhat loosely applied to any instance of supernatural help. The reason for the receipt of power is often attributed to the strong supernatural elements of the favoured one, or to his having made himself agreeable to supernatural beings by the observance of ceremonial chastity or other preliminary means. A few individuals assert that there is a tendency for supernatural aid to follow certain ancestral families, but such a belief is not general.

The following story is typical of the kind of assistance granted although no clear picture can be presented except through the native medium—a number of different tales, such as are given in the following chapter.

THE GOOD NATURED OF Tsimdji

One long after the earth was first populated there were living at Qwiqwi, near Nanaq, two Bella Bella men, Qwa'sala and Ealkas, with their wives, children, and slaves. Qwa'sala's son, Tsimdji, fell a victim to the evident disease, during which causes the face of the sufferer to swell and his flesh to rot. When the case appeared hopeless, his father called his people to tell the people to abandon Qwiqwi, and to leave the dying youth alone. Accordingly they removed the planks from the houses, packed them on canoes with all the food and clothing from the village and went away, leaving the unfortunate Tsimdji alone in his misery. Only an old slave woman took pity on him; before she left she did some glowing embers, and frayed cedar-bark in a large clam-shell and told him where to find them.

Tsimdji was lonely when his relatives departed, but presently he dried his tears and set about making the best of his position. He succeeded the clam-shell and lay the embers into a fire. Then he made a tomahawk with which he built a rude shelter. A diet of clams at first satisfied him, but before long he made a hook in hopes of catching some cod. He went up the river to a suitable spot, dropped in his baited hook and almost immediately felt a bite. He hauled up his line eagerly, but it was only a worthless bell-head. Angrily he pulled out the hook and threw the fish back into the water. Almost immediately there was a bite, again he threw up the line only to find as before that it was a bell-head, which he hurled back into the river. This happened twice more, and, discouraged at landing only four useless fish, he wrapped his head type of dance differs from all other Bella Coola ones, since no 756 * initiatory prerogative is required. Years ago such exhibitions 556 were common, although curing shamans were rare.

The usual time for a shaman's performance is at the con- [796] clusion of the fasting season, though one is sometimes held prior to that period if the would-be performer fears that the food which he has stored up for the event is likely to be frozen.

When he decides to give a dance, the shaman first summons 533
the singers to his house and teaches them a song of his own 756 * composition. Theoretically both text and tune should have 556 been received from his supernatural benefactor, but many performers undoubtedly employ songs used by shamans ancestors which they have chanced to remember. Another device is to describe a supernatural being seen in a dream. In some cases there is deliberate deception, but in most the performer persuades himself that he has received supernatural authorization.
The texts are full of obscure allusions, a river, for example, is [195] spoken of as swift running water. Often a man will treasure a song for years, before collecting the wealth necessary to use it publicly, with the social prestige attached. A shaman always obtains a name from his supernatural benefactor, but [653] if a man merely uses a feat observed in a dream, this is impossible, so he adopts the designation of some deceased shaman, more convincing himself that it was attained by the apparition.
Others will probably remember this name, hence suspicions [189] may easily be aroused concerning the authenticity of the performance, but it is not customary to voice them. The singers repeat the song which they have just heard, and continue doing so until they have mastered it. Sometimes they compose further songs themselves for the performer. During the prac- 756 * tising, those who are not initiates are expelled from the house. 556

such a ceremony, that is, if he is validating his name, the gifts must be valuable. On later occasions, irrespective of whether it is the same trick or another that is performed, the presents will be of small value. Goods so given are not returnable. After dancing, a shaman wears his collar of dyed and undyed cedar-bark all summer, in fact until he rids himself of his supernatural endowment by the performance of a hactsa rite the following winter.

Thus there is close inter-dependence of shaman and hactsa dancer. On any later occasion, at a ceremony when songs of all types are being sung, if the singers hear out the tunes of those used at the ritual just described, the shaman dances to them. This is said to "cure" him, as if the power within him was a source of danger.

The following are examples of the conjuring tricks performed, most of them done by the shaman Nootcumlaie, a relative of an informant, who was able to learn the methods employed.

On one occasion Nootcumlaie prepared two boxes, apparently the ordinary wooden ones used for cooking; across each he arranged a diagonal cross-piece so that the receptacle contained two watertight compartments. Previous to the performance, Nootcumlaie poured water, dyed red with the bark of the alder, into one section of one of the boxes, and put eagle down in one of the compartments of the other. When the time came to carry out the rite he asked an accomplice, another shaman, to bring some water and pour it into his box. This was done, the assistant taking care to put it into the empty half, not into that which contained the dyed water. Nootcumlaie shook the box and poured out some of the liquid to prove that it really was water, and then drank. The spectators, unaware of the cross-piece, did not notice that he did so from the corner opposite to that from which he had poured the water. He had, of course, drunk the dyed fluid. Nootcumlaie cried out that what he had swallowed was poising him, and proceeded to vomit the red water, much to the surprise of the shamans power the grease on the central fire, and throws on it also the figures and some dried salmon. Thus propitiated, it is believed that the dead will be more likely to allow the soul-man to be sucked forth.

Shamans from the dead perform conjuring feats and dramatic performances of the same type as ordinary shamans. Until he gives his first dance a newly entered shaman is known as a lion, the same word that is used for a Bactar initiate, and during this period he wears the shaman's collar of incrustated dyed and undyed cedar-bark. If he is wealthy and influential, a shaman will repeat his dance every fourth year. Such a performance can be held at any season, although the usual time is after the Bactar ceremonies. The dramatic representations are of scenes witnessed in the land below, though sometimes they are done in a reverse manner, following the practice of the dead in doing things oppositely. Thus one shaman reported that the ghosts wore very long blankets, but when he danced he wore one that came only to his hips. The method of singing is the same as that employed by ordinary shamans, but one whose power is derived from the dead dances with hand here down-wards, his free hand pointing to the ground with first finger extended. Also his cry of "ewai, ewai, ewai," covered by incrustals with a deep cadence, differs from that used by ordinary shamans. A dance always continues with the distribution of food to validate the ceremony.

Like ordinary shamans, those from the dead cannot communicate their power. At death their songs too are lost, unless they choose to give them to a friend who is also a shaman from the dead. This is obviously contrary to the theoretical belief that all songs have been obtained during revelations, but is not at all contrary to the Bella Coola practice of having the singers recite the ceremonies in "remembering" their visions.

The following tale, although drawn from the shaman past, is a typical illustration of one of the many ways in which shamanistic power is received from the dead.*

* If the stories of similar type have been included in vol. 1, they are to explain the life of the body, and others are grouped together in the next chapter.

and those who have knowledge of them are sorcerers. Even a man of this kind is not outside the pale of society unless he practises indiscriminately; members of the Sacrae society, for example, frequently employ one to kill an individual who has offended against their regulations (2, p. 140). A man is regarded as a sorcerer not on account of his knowledge but on account of the ends to which he applies it.

Closely related to, if not identical with, the belief that certain consequences follow certain acts, is the conviction that the infraction of ritual prohibitions brings disaster. There are many such taboos, for so they may be called. Though more important at the critical periods of life, puberty, pregnancy, while observing ceremonial chastity, and so forth, there are many which must be observed at all times.

Restrictions pertaining to the rites and regulations at birth and death have already been described. Like magical acts, these often verge on the religious owing to the belief that disregard offends supernatural beings. On the whole, however, it seems as if most infractions bring their own punishment without intervention of higher powers, a concept which throws taboos into the category of magic rather than of religion, with the ever-present proviso that the two cannot be separated entirely from one another. With them may be mentioned a number of ritual acts connected with fishing and hunting in which, though the element of propitiation is not absent, it is outdated by the performance of definite rites. Finally, there have been included in this chapter a number of unimportant beliefs, the psychology of which cannot be analysed.

What is the basis of these rites defined as Medicine, Magic, and Taboo? As already described, the Bulu Code either do not explain their origin and function, or merely state that Mpwomo is responsible, as he is for every activity of life. This is unsatisfactory because many which, viewed scientifically, have neither causative nor preventive power, produce the desired end. A child who has been "made" a sorcerer during infancy, usually grows up to be proficient in that profession; the person [755] of water in which bad bass boiled eight spikeroes from a coffin. She would have obtained two from each side, and two from each end, in each case inserting the point of a crooked knife to pry loose a fragment of the wood, and then pulling it off in the same direction as the sun travels. It would have been immaterial from which aspect the first bad been taken, but it would have been needful to move around the coffin from east to south to west to north, corresponding to the course of the sun.

It is believed that no one has now the ability to use this charm.

Sorcerers

[756] Among the counter medicines of which knowledge has been handed down to various families for generations are secret means of killing. Every sorcerer must have such a possession, but he is not so bounded within he begins to exercise his powers for anti-social purposes. For example, if it be known that a [757] certain individual is able to cause death, the members of the Darter society are eager to attach him to their group, so that his ability will be at their disposal to punish anyone who breaks their regulations. Likewise, if a chief decides that a certain [758] man should die, the power of his thoughts may suffice to cause the death, but the desired end will be effected more certainly by separating out from the owner of a means of killing. Such [759] an individual is frequently a shaman who is only too glad of an opportunity to exhibit his powers. The following methods of sorcerer are said to have been employed socially, that is, with the sorcerer or at the request of chiefs or the members of the Darter society:

(a) The sorcerer secretes for four successive nights on the door of the victim's house. If the latter suspects what is to take place, he may endeavour to escape by remaining awake which renders the sorcerer powerless. It is said that no one has been able to remain sleepless for more than three nights which gives the killer his opportunity.

533 in the following examples. The subdivisions as called out by the announcer are separated by vertical lines and, where possible, a translation of each is given. The sounds of wordless choruses were not recorded. The different types are arranged according to order of mention in this monograph.

Sisaak Songs

533 575 946 The themes of sisaak songs differ according to the purpose for which they have been composed. For instance, when a young person is being initiated into the society, the words usually refer to his crest, the tsuwinam which brought his song; at potlatches, to the goods which will soon be given away and the phrasing is often grandiloquent; sometimes the two concepts are combined. These differences are clearly shown in the examples which follow. A few sisaak songs have been preserved for generations, but most are newly composed for each winter season and the old ones forgotten. Since few rites of this type have been carried out during recent years, it was difficult to obtain complete versions.

(d) Lawelpaw-ĕ' is a Kitkatla name from the north. The first owner moved to Kitkatla where he married, and the designation was transmitted to his descendants. One of the latter migrated to Kimsquit, where the name has since been handed down from generation to generation through its original owners has not been forgotten.

(m) An invitation not to be taken too literally.

Xe-tla Songs

The tunes of xe-tla songs are believed to have been handed down, unaltered, for many generations. The words, too, are frequently ancient although the singers sometimes make slight changes so that they will be more suitable for the chief in whose honour they are being sung. Owing to the decline of ceremonials in which they were used, few xe-tla songs are now remembered. [796]

Kwakiutl Songs

The texts of kwakiutl songs are fragmentary and unsatisfactory. The rites in which they were used have long been discontinued and, since they were never ceremonially important, there was nothing to impress either tunes or words on the minds of the singers. In addition, it is probable that the songs were always less carefully constructed than those of other types. 538* [796]

WARFARE*

General Observations — Specific Accounts

General Observations

721 PRIOR to the establishment of British rule, there was considerable warfare among the coastal tribes of British 648 Columbia. Long-continued struggles leading to the commencement of one or other of the participants were unknown, but there were constant raids, counter-raids, forays, and attacks. These were never so continuous as on the Plains, where martial achievements were regarded more highly than on the coast, but it appears probable that at least several villages of the Bella Coola were embroiled every few years. Nevertheless,
[794] war was secondary in importance to ceremonial rites. During the winter, peace reigned and members of hostile tribes were [589] even received as guests at some dances. At potlatches they might be subjected to insults, later to be avenged in the same manner or by active hostility, but seldom was actual violence offered either to envoys or guests. The symbol of peace and
726 friendliness was eagle down; the occupants of a canoe who 825 bore an invitation to a potlatch, or who were guests themselves, used to blow this substance up into the air whenever 778 another craft approached, and it was incumbent on the latter [784] to veer over to the other side of the channel. Eagle down was [578] considered to be so sacred that when two men were quarrelling
[627] a chief could stop them by blowing some of it over their heads.
721 In winter, hostilities were prevented by ceremonies, and in summer the people were usually busy laying in supplies of food; consequently, it was only in the late spring that fighting was [575] at all common. Even then the dictates of ceremonial life were [622] not entirely forgotten; no haiat novice went to war and [illegible] a chief who had given many potlatches. Successful raiders rarely slew such an one; his position placed him above the dangers to which lesser men were subject.

Raids appear never to have been carried out solely for the purpose of giving warriors opportunities to display their prowess, or of permitting young men to prove their mettle. Scarcity of food was the commonest cause for forays when, of course, the victims were chosen for their accumulated supplies. The Kwakiutl especially, lacking abundance of salmon, often envied the Bella Coola. Even more dreaded were the Kitkatla, the most warlike people of the central coast, who used to sail for many miles to carry off slaves whom they sold or traded for other commodities. Trespassing, too, was a source of friction which often led to hostility. In such a case, the offenders were usually held up to ridicule or punishment, and the irritation gradually increased until wiped out in bloodshed. Members of a tribe which had suffered from a raid prompted by any of these motives would await a suitable opportunity for retaliation; this in turn would be avenged, and a vendetta often ensued lasting for generations. As already described, a ceremonial error brought punishment from a neighbouring tribe; this was the only motive which caused fighting between different Bella Coola villages. In the last century there was a struggle of this kind between the people of Ilmo and Alpitkof in which the former were victorious and took many slaves who were later ransomed. When Ilkatk had dogged a village or a group of villages for some time, the inhabitants sometimes endeavoured to wipe out their misfortunes by attacking another tribe.

The teeming salmon at Bella Coola, Kimsquit, and Tal-is, made it unnecessary for the Bella Coola to wage aggressive war for which they were unfitted both on account of their unmilitary attitude and their lack of central authority. On the other hand, they were tempting victims for more belligerent neighbours. The narrow Bella Coola valley, however, far removed from the open sea, and densely populated, was difficult to attack.

[illegible] he is wrong, he pays them. It is said that in former times each stick used to be painted with a special device, and that each had its own name; even now they are beautifully made and highly polished by much passing from hand to hand. The Clowess play the same game but use heavier sticks instead of sticks. Formerly it was not uncommon for a man to bet his goods, his wives and children, and even himself at this game. If he lost, the persons so wagered became slaves of the victor unless redeemed by their friends. Women, too, gambled freely; in fact, neophytes recently admitted into the Bear society were the only men to whom this practice was forbidden.

Of actual games, the one most commonly played is shinny, as many as eight or ten contestants can take part, each providing himself with one, two, or three stones, packed down to the proper shape. Each is about six inches in length, three inches wide, flat on one side, and oval on the other, well rounded at either end. Before the coming of the white man, when the Bella Coola habitually used stone, it is said that one of these could be made in a few minutes. A mark is set up, and the first player throws his missile in the air, endeavoring to make it come to rest as close as possible to the target. The game is usually played on an open space near the village, but even on comparatively smooth ground there is great chance of bouncing and the thrower must gauge this possibility as well as have correct direction and distance. The second player likewise throws his stone, trying to land it nearer the target, or to knock away his rival's. In so doing, the latter, lying on the ground, is often broken, which puts its owner out of the game for the time being. When all have thrown, the one who has come nearest the mark is the winner. Sometimes each contestant throws two or more stones, and sometimes sides are chosen. Large numbers of broken gaming stones can be found near every old village site, confirming the statements of the older men and women concerning the universality of the sport

Likewise called shin, a name said either to be derived from that of a forgan, or that the latter is derived from it.

[157] tacker than hunting birds and small animals with miniature bows and arrows, or snaring them in nooses of grass or string. Little girls make playhouses in which they cook wonderful meals of berries, with perhaps the addition of a wooden fish. On the whole, however, the children do not enter into play as boisterously as white boys and girls, nor do they seem to derive as much pleasure from it. In former times, when clothing was scanty, small boys used to delight in pricking nettles and beating one another with the stinging branches; this must have caused considerable pain, but it was a point of honour not to cry out, and anyone, perhaps caught unaware, who showed discomfort, was laughed at as a coward. Both boys and girls are fond of swinging, and even adult women sometimes find time to enjoy themselves by swaying to and fro at the end of a rope.

[158] [159]

Young Bella Coola do not have as many toys as white children, and none of them is complex. Some girls have crude wooden dolls, though elaborate figurines are reserved for use in dance dances. Perhaps the most cherished plaything is a small puppy or, in recent years, a kitten, though the unfortunate animal is handled and mauled without consideration. A good carpenter may make for his son a wooden top or a bull-roarer, to the envy of his less fortunate friends. Both types of toys are said to be used in Nusmaiti and at some Swaiat dances the masked figures carry them to play with.

[160] [161]

[162]

There is one game, sleli, which the salmon are said to delight to watch, and which is accordingly played by boys as soon as the first spring salmon have been disposed of with fitting rites. Each makes for himself, or is given by his father, a wooden spear with a projecting barb, fastened as shown in the accompanying sketch (see Fig. 2). A hoop of branches is made and thrown into a pool of stagnant, or slow-moving water, on each side of which stands a rival group of competitors. At a signal, all throw their spears simultaneously, with the intention of passing them through the ring, so that the barb of each will

APPENDIX B

BELLA COOLA-ENGLISH VOCABULARY

DURING the period in the field, the writer's attention was devoted 128 entirely to sociological and religious investigation, and no attempt 192* was made either to analyze the structure of the Bella Coola language or to record texts. This part of the monograph consists only of words which [114] were collected incidentally, and no effort was made to compile an exhaustive list, or even a representative one. This explains the preponderance of proper names, and the large number of terms connected with rituals of all kinds, some of which are rapidly disappearing from common usage. Many of these were used by the writer incidentally in gathering technical data, and their interpretation is unquestionably correct. A few words, however, were not recorded on different occasions, or from different informants, so that some errors may have crept in, either in transcription or in recording. No terms have been employed of which the writer has any real doubt, but the same accuracy is not claimed for this vocabulary as for the monograph as a whole. Lack of knowledge of Bella Coola [195] grammar made it impracticable to utilize the words recorded in the songs, since many of them include affixes and other grammatical elements that affect the root.

In listing the words alphabetically, the following arbitrary system of letter order has been followed and all symbols have been disregarded, for example, a and ā are not separated.

- a follows n.
- ā follows a.
- b follows a.
- c follows b.
- d follows c.
- e follows a.

614 The gens Spatsá'lit have brooches painted on the house-front, and use in dances the mask of a large kind of whale (k'ûsis), of the crow, and of 532 the black bear.
342 The gens Tsmoó'skyas use the mask of Ôuxtsilt'ma (=the sleeper) and the eagle.

The gens Tl'ah'amû'ôt of the Nsak'a'listmx use the moon (fig. 2).

The gens Isle'stimôt of the Tâlis'mx use the raven, robin (sin'a'gmô), eagle, whale, the bird t'ûmîsis (goose?), and o'ailad'ots, the flood-tide. They have sun, moon, and stars painted on the house-front, and the wasp'ots suspended from the beams of the roof (see p. 420).

The highest gens of Nôtl'a'l has the name Smô'xa (=the north wind). He has the mountain Sawâ'kmx surmounted by a mackerel sky, and with clouds on its sides, painted on his house-front (fig. 3). Another object belonging to his crest represents warm.

614 The children belong to the gens of either father or mother, the deci-851 sion being left to the choice of the parents.

Secret Societies and the Potlatch.

171 The social organization, festivals, and secret societies of the Bilqula are still more closely interwoven than they are among the Kwakiutl, and 575 must be considered in connection. We have to describe here the potlatch, the Sisa'kn, and the Ko'sôt. The Sisa'kn corresponds to the Tlôxla'qa of the northern Kwakiutl tribes, the Ko'sôt to the Ts'tsat'ch'a. The Bilqula believe that the potlatch has been instituted by ten deities, nine 556 brothers and one sister, the foremost among whom is Qô'mtôm, to whose 773 care the sunrise is intrusted. He resides with the others in a beautiful house in the far east, and rises ô! ô! every morning when the sun rises. He has to take care that the sun rises properly. The first six of these deities are grouped in pairs, and are believed to paint their faces with designs representing moon, stars, and rainbow. In the Ku'sitt these deities make their appearance, and are represented by masks which I have copied. Qō'mtsina and Qtsqōmalk'otin wear the design of the full moon, indicated in the mask Qō'mtsina (fig. 4) by a double curved line in red and black, the black outside, passing over forehead, cheeks, and upper lip. Qtsqōmalk'otin has a double curved line in red and black, the red outside, which passes over forehead, cheeks, and chin (fig. 5). Alemki'lkya (fig. 6) and Alemalk'otin (fig. 7) wear the design of the crescent, drawn 556 773 776 592 575 776

in red and black, with differences similar to those between the first and second. The fifth, K'tsak'tsakl'lkya, and K'ū'mtsina have designs representing stars (fig. 8), both wearing the same style of mask. The seventh is K'ula'qawa, whose face represents the blossom of a salmonberry bush (fig. 9). The next in order, Kuit'lina (=who wants to have blankets first), wears the design of the rainbow in black and blue (fig. 10). The ninth, Ai'sent'k wears on the head a mask representing a kingfisher, and is clothed in a birdskin blanket. The last of the series is a woman called Ti'tsal'qōtlkna (=the sister), the sister of all the others. Her face is painted with a bladder filled with grease (fig. 11). She figures in several legends as stealing provisions and pursued by the people whom she has robbed.

The Sisem'ku, which is danced at potlatches and other festivals of gentes, is presided over by a being that lives in the sea. A man who had gone out fishing met the Sisem'ku, and was instructed by him in the secrets of the dance. When he returned he asked the people to clean their houses, and to strew them with clean sand, before he commenced to enter. Then he danced the Sisem'ku, and told the people what he had seen. He said that the being had commanded them to perform this dance and to adorn themselves when dancing with carved headdresses with 575 773 776 796 represent. Every time the sacred objects of a gens are shown to the 614 people a potlatch is given. The sacred objects, although the property of the 532 various gentes, must nevertheless be acquired by each individual. That 432 is to say, every free person has the right to acquire a certain group of 556 carvings and names, according to the gens to which he or she belongs. Slaves and slaves' children, also illegitimate children, could not become Sisaa'ks. A person cannot take a new carving, but must wait until it is [567] given to him by his relatives—father, mother, or elder brother. Nesh'a- [848] la'ela, to whom I owe my information regarding the gentes, and who is a member of the gens Iele'ilemit of the Talio'mx, stated that he had received the raven when he gave his first potlatch. At his second potlatch [115]

he received the eagle. He hopes that his mother will give him the whale at his next potlatch, and will at the same time divulge to him the secrets connected with it. In course of time, he said, he might get even others from his brother; but if the latter's children should prove to be very good, and develop very rapidly, his brother would probably give his secrets to his children. At festivals, when a person acquires a new secret, he 614 changes his name. Each person has two names, a Ki'eitt name, which 424 remains the same throughout life; and a Qi'ntelem name, which is changed 551 at these festivals. Thus, Nesh'ela'ela's (which is his Ki'eitt name) 556 present Qi'ntelem name is Ait'ilemer'ha'eit, but at his next potlatch he intends to take the name of Kalit'kin. These names are also the property 575 of the various gentes, each gens having its own name. In the list of gentes given above, the names enumerated are the Ki'eitt names of the acquirers. In two cases only the Qi'ntelem names have been ascertained 424 (see p. 428). When a man possesses several Sisaa'ks secrets he will distribute them among his children. When a girl marries, her father or 575
mother may, after a child has been born to her, give one or several of 614 their Sisaa'ks secrets to her husband, as his children make him a member of the gens. When a person gets to be old he gives away all his Sisaa'ks secrets. After any secret has been given away the giver must not use it [426] any more. The crest and the Sisaa'ks carvings must not be loaned to others, but each person must keep his own carvings. The only exceptions are the carved headdresses and the raven rattles, which are not the property of any particular gens.

The laws regarding the potlatch are similar to those of the Kwakiutl. 556
The receiver of a present becomes the debtor of the person who gave 426
the potlatch. If the latter should die the debts become due to his heirs. If the debtor should die his heirs become responsible for the debt. Property is also destroyed at potlatches. This is not returned, and serves only to enhance the social position of the individual who performed this act. It is not necessary that all the property given by a person in a potlatch should be owned by him. He may borrow part of it from his friends, and has to repay it with interest. I was told, for instance, that a man borrowed a large copper-plate and burned it at a potlatch. When doing so he had to name the price which he was going to pay to the owner in the stead. Since that time he died, and his heirs are now responsible for the amount named at the potlatch.

The Ki'eitt is presided over by a female spirit, called Aneilkitsai'a. 575
Her abode is a cave in the woods, which she keeps shut from February 773 till October, remaining all the while inside. In October she opens the 776 door of her cave and sits in front of it. A woman is said to have been the first to find her. Aneilkitsai'a invited her into her cave and taught her the secrets of the Ka'uût. She wore ornaments of red cedar-bark around her head, wrists, and ankles; her face was blackened, her hair strewn with eagle-down. She commanded the woman to dance in the same way as she saw her dancing. The people should accompany her dance with songs, and, after she had finished, they should dance with masks. She said, 'Whenever a person sees me your people shall dance the Ka'uût. If you do not do so I shall punish you with death and sickness. In summer, while I am in my house, you must not dance the Ka'uût.'

6:Boas E-5 (1886-ca. 1890)1892

Ever since that time the Hâqah dance the Kû'siût. When a man has seen Amaklikstem's sitting before her cave he will invite the people to a Ka'uût. A sling made of red and white cedar-bark is hung up in his house, and the uninitiated are not allowed to enter it. Only in the evening, when dances are performed, they may look on, standing close to the door. As soon as the dances are over they must retire from the taboo house. Each Ka'uût lasts three days.

The various dances performed by members of the Kû'siût are also the property of the gentes, and the right of performing them is restricted to members of the gens. They may not be given to a daughter's husband, as is the case with the Sisaa'ka dances (see above), but belong to the members of the gens alone. They may, however, be loaned and borrowed by members of the gens, who have a right to a particular dance, but who do not own it. Permission to use a mask or dance is obtained from the owner by payments. The owner may reclaim the dance or the borrower may return it at any time. Membership of the Kû'siût is obtained through an initiation. At this time the novice is given his Kû'siût name, which he retains throughout life. Each gens has its peculiar Kû'siût names, which are inherited by young persons from their parents or from other relatives. Thus a young man who had the name of Pô'pô until he was about seventeen years old obtained at his initiation the name of Tl'akô'otl. I have not reached a very clear understanding of the details of the initiation; it seems that the dance is simply given to the novice in the same way as the Sisaa'ka, this initiation being connected with a potlatch. But still it seems possible that he must 'dream' of the dance which he is to perform. Only the highest degrees of the Kû'siût have to pass through a religious ceremony of some importance. The highest degrees are the tlaqô'tla (the Hâ'mats'a of the Kwakiutl), the Ô'lsq (the Nû'tlmatl of the Kwakiutl), and the Dâ'tla (the Nô'nteistatl of the Hâ'iltsuk). These grades are also hereditary. A Kû'siût novice may acquire them at once at his first initiation.

When the tlaqô'tla is initiated he goes into the forest, where he encounters his guardian spirit. It is believed that he goes up to the sun, and formerly he had to take human flesh along for food. The chiefs held a council the night preceding the beginning of the ceremonies, and anyone who wanted to show his liberality offered one of his slaves to be killed, in order to serve as food for the tlaqô'tla. The offer was accepted and a payment of from ten to twenty blankets made for the slave. The latter was killed, and the members of the tlaqô'tla order devoured one-half of the body before the departure of the novice to the woods. There the latter is tied up and left to fast. He may stay there for twenty or thirty days until the spirit appears to him and takes him up to the sun, where he is initiated. Early one morning he returns, and is heard outside the houses. He has lost all his hair, which, it is believed, has been torn out by the strong breeze blowing in the higher regions. He is quite naked, and bites everyone whom he can lay hold of. If he cannot catch anyone he will bite his own arm. It is believed that he has lost his soul, which fled from the body when the spirit came to him. Therefore the shamans must try for four days to recapture his soul. The night after they have recovered it the ɮlaqô'tla dances clothed in a bear-skin and wearing a large headring, heavy bracelets and anklets, all made of red and white cedar-bark. Some ɮlaqô'tla do not bite people, but merely devour raw salmon, or tear dogs to pieces and devour them. Those who bite people will also eat corpses. The ɮlaqô'tla has to observe a number of regulations. For four years after his initiation he must not gamble. He must stay away from his wife for one year, but this period is being reduced to one month. For two or three months he must not leave his house. 575 [774] [756] [292] [301]

The Ô'lɮq (= the laugher) and the Dâ'tia (= the thrower) do not go into the woods to be initiated, but both must fast three days before their first dance. The Ô'lɮq 'makes fun of everything' and scratches people with his nails. The Dâ'tia carries stones and sticks, and breaks household goods and canoes. If he has destroyed some object during the day he pays for it at night when he dances. The Ôlɮq and the Dâ'tia must stay for one month, after they have danced, in their houses. [785]

If a person transgresses the laws of the Kû'siût, for instance when the ɮlaqô'tla gambles, or when a man performs a dance to which he has no right, also when a person derides the ceremonies or makes a mistake in dancing, his punishment is death. The chiefs assemble in council and the offender is called before the court. After his offence has been proved he is asked whether he is willing to suffer the penalty of death. If he is not willing, and one of his relatives is found willing to take the penalty on himself, the guilty party is spared, and the substitute is killed in his stead. The execution of the judgment is entrusted to the shaman, who bewitches the condemned person by throwing disease into him, or by poisoning him in some other (supernatural?) way. The object thrown by the shaman is a shell, bone, or finger-nail, around the middle of which objects a human hair is tied. If this object strikes the offender he will fall sick. Blood collects in his stomach, and if it so happens that he vomits this blood, and with it the disease-producing object, he will recover, and is not molested any further. The masks (not the whistles and other ornaments) used in the Kû'siût are burnt immediately at the close of each dancing season. Novices must wear a necklet of red cedar-bark over their blankets for a whole year. The masks used in the dances represent mythical personages, and the dances are pantomimic representations of myths. Among others the thunder-bird and his servant Atlqulâ'tɛnum, who wears a mask with red and blue stripes over the whole face from the right-hand upper side to the left-hand lower side, and a staff with red and blue spiral lines, appear in the dances. Prominent masks are also Qô'mtsioa and his brothers and his sister (see p. 412), Maamaalâ'niq and his fellows, the raven and the Nuuqô'mta, and many others. 575 688 575 532 796 [776]

It is evident that the culture of the Bilqula is very greatly influenced 177 by that of the Kwakiutl. The secret societies and the potlatch ceremonies 551 are almost a copy of those of the Hêiltsuk. This influence has been so 556 deep that names of even deities and of the mythical ancestors of certain 575 gentes are purely Kwakiutl words, or have at least Kwakiutl endings. Thus 776 the name Aiumkt'likya (see p. 413) is purely Kwakiutl, meaning 'good all 771 over the world.' K'ômk'omkt'likya is also a Kwakiutl word, meaning 'the rich one of the world.' The chief's name, Ma'lakyilail (see p. 409) belongs to the same class of Kwakiutl names. On the other hand, the religious ideas of the Bilqula are very curiously developed, and apparently but slightly influenced by their neighbours. The whole Masmasla'niq tradition is peculiar to them, but has been partly adopted by the Awiky'- ô'noq, with whom the Bilqula have intermarried.

776 the House of Myths, but who has given up his place in favor of Sunx and Ats'unts'un. These two might be called the rulers of mankind. In most traditions they are described as trying to destroy man, notwithstanding the fact that they are considered the creators of mankind. This peculiar charac-773 teristic of these deities is clearly brought out in the traditions recorded on 776 pp. 38 ff. In one legend which I collected in 1890, Ats'unts'un's mother, Nanaumik'tequna'm, is described as a Cannibal, who inserts her long snout in the ears of men, and sucks out his brain. Eventually she was transformed into the mosquito.[1] I did not hear her mentioned as one of the deities residing in the House of Myths. According to the same tradition, the salmon were obtained by a man who gambled with Ats'unts'un, the stake being the salmon. Ats'unts'un lost, and the man took the salmon down [828] from heaven. Another legend of the origin of the salmon is recorded on p. 38, where it is told how the birds obtained the salmon. According to still another tradition (p. 94), the Raven obtained the salmon by marrying a salmon girl.
In the tradition quoted above, Ats'unts'un also gives to man the power to cure [755] disease by means of the water of life, which the shaman sprinkles on the sick person.

A number of inferior deities live in the House of Myths. They might 776 be called the assistants of the principal deities. In order to understand their [772] functions, it is necessary to state that the deities residing in the House of Myths have particular charge of the religious winter ceremonial of the [796] Bella Coola which is called kā'siut, and which corresponds to the ts'ents'eqa [575] of the Kwakiutl. I have described this ceremonial, and its importance in the social life of the Kwakiutl, in another paper.[2] The kā'siut is of equal importance to an understanding of the social life and mythology of the Bella Coola. It is sufficient to say at this place that the ceremonials performed during the kā'siut are mostly dramatic representations of myths [532] referring to the various deities, particularly to those of the House of Myths:
therefore masks representing these deities are used in the ceremonials.
Plates VII to XII[3] show a series of these masks. Figs. 1, 2, and 4 (Plate VII) are Sunx, Ats'unts'un, and Sneak'alx'a'la. The functions of many of the 575 inferior deities seem to refer solely to the kā'siut. These deities and their 776 functions are as follows: Sha'ath'tial'x' (Plate VII, Fig. 6) ordains the death of men and animals. According to one statement that I received, there are four deities of this name in the House of Myths. It is his particular duty to kill those who transgress the laws of the kā'siut. This deity is mentioned by Jacobsen, who calls him Sch-selk Kallai.[4] Nanat'seq'ala (Plate VII, Fig. 7), or the Sneat'iq of the House of Myths, sits by himself in one corner of the house. He prevents those who are not initiated in the secrets of the kā'xlat from approaching the house. The Sxnu'q is a fabulous monster, the peculiarities of which are described in a number of traditions (see pp. 83 ff.). S'ants.a'mnn.a'lt (Plate VII, Figs. 12 and 13) is a boy who performs kā'xlat dances all the time. When the deities resolve to send a new dance down to our world, it is conveyed by S'ants.a'mnn.a'lt. It is the office of another deity to sing, accompanying the kā'xlat dances of the gods (Plate VII, Fig. 3). Anuqat'n'xnn is a deity in regard to whose functions I have not been able to obtain detailed information. It is said that he intervenes on behalf of man when Sanx and A.k'antā'm threaten to punish him. There are two goddesses in the house who also intervene in favor of man when the principal deities threaten him with death and sickness. Their names are Sntoma'xn (Plate VII, Fig. 9) and Ainlā'xxa (Plate VII, Figs. 10 and 11). They wake man after sleep. Without their help, nobody could wake from sleep. Ainlā'xxa is at the same time the guardian of the moon. Every month she restores the moon to her full size, and she cleans her face after an eclipse. The moon is called A'm.'ts.gilo (Plate X, Fig. 10). The eclipse is produced by several deities called Aiq'ut'yonnm, which means "painting the face black" (Plate X, Figs. 4-6). It is believed that at this time the moon performs one of the most sacred ceremonies of the kā'xlat, which are thought to be very dangerous to the performer. The black paint with which her face is covered is supposed to be a protection against these dangers. Ainlā'xxa cleans off the paint after the dance has been completed. According to Jacobsen,[1] the Indians say that during an eclipse the moon (Ewklo-bellilla) paints her face black. The same deities are believed to paint and to clean the faces of human kā'xlat dancers. Sntoma'xn and Ainlā'xxa also resuscitate those who are killed by the dangerous performances of the kā'xlat.

While the functions of the beings enumerated here are mostly concerned with the kā'xlat, others are more immediately concerned with the affairs of the world. Important among these is K'ū'xū'k'ni'm (Plate VII, Fig. 1). Sanx is the creator of man, but his work is supplemented by that of the god K'ū'xū'k'ni'm. When Sanx creates a new-born child, K'ū'xū'k'ni'm gives the child its individual features. Before children are born, the goddess named Nutx'qamalal'x' or Stmatma'lotas Sanxalā'n.nis places them in a cradle and rocks them. After she ceases rocking them, the children are sent down to our world. She also rocks the young of all animals; and when she stops, Sanx sends them down to our world to be born. At the same time he ordains that their skins and their flesh shall serve for clothing and food for man. Nutx'qamalal'x' might therefore be called the deity paint. They taught him the methods of hunting, and, according to some, they made the fish. The Bella Coola say, when carving a design, that Mem-mamlk'nis gives them the idea which they are working out. 776

Sees has a daughter named Sp'ex'p'ik'ent'm, who invented the art of working cedar-bark. Her figure is also used in the kt'int ceremonial, in which the invention of the preparation of cedar-bark is represented. This deity has an assistant called Omstmc'k', who supports the stick over the edge of which she is breaking the bark. When first breaking bark, she shouts, "Ai.ets sisya'kmm ti Omstmc'k'mes" ("Bring to me Omstmc'k'"). After he has been given to her, she shouts, "Ai.ets sisya'kmm to spek'n.m" ("Bring me the board on which to break the bark"). After receiving this, she demands the cedar-bark breaker, saying, "Ai.ets ensk'pmm.ai'ts to sp'k'mm." Finally she asks for cedar-bark, saying, "Ai.ets k'ush.tkamo'kais ti sp'k'emmes." Then she begins to work, singing,— [575] [539]

"E ses ek'k'emes! ts'mes'k'mes ts'ses!
E ses emmel'ts ts! Sp'ex'p'ik'ent'm mes tsemelli'ts'ts."

("Behold me, ye who are not intimidated!
I am the Cedar-bark Breaker of tsemelli'ts'ts.")

It seems that most of the Bella Coola maintain that the Raven also lives in the House of Myths, but this point of their mythology is somewhat obscure and contradictory. According to the tradition of a number of families, the Raven was one of the beings sent down by Sees to our world to become the ancestor of man, but at the same time it is told that he invented certain arts. It is stated that he made the first salmon-trap (m.tk'a'l), which is used in connection with the salmon-weir. 776 773

It is also said that Mem-mamlk'nis attempted to make the whistles for the winter ceremonial, that he was unsuccessful, and that the Raven succeeded in making them; also that the Raven came down to give the world its present shape. He instituted the festivals of the Bella Coola, and then returned to the House of Myths.

Besides all these deities, there are nine brothers and their sister particularly concerned with the observations of the kt'int ceremonial (Plate IX, Figs. 1-9). The names of the brothers are, Xemstmalk'm.la, Xe'mstiwa, Omq'mak'lik'a, Q'a'mstiwa, Almalk'm.ala, Al'amk'lik'a, K'ik'lias, Q'alaxt'wa, A'i'mak'; and of their sister, i.'ttat'apits.ana. These deities are painted with certain designs. Xemstmalk'm.la and Xe'mstiwa are painted with the design of the full moon (the former carries a staff wound with red and white cedar-bark); Omq'mak'lik'a and Q'a'mstiwa, with the design of the half-moon; Almalk'm.ala and Al'amk'lik'a, with the design representing the stars; K'ik'lias, with the design of the rainbow; Q'alaxt'wa, with the de- 776 776 532

776 sign of the salmon-berry blossom: A't'mâk' has the shape of a kingfisher;
532 and L'ctsa'aplêLana is painted with the design of a sea-lion bladder filled with grease. She wears rings of red and white cedar-bark. The carving representing the kingfisher has the wings attached to the sides of the head, while the tail rises over the forehead. Xêmxêmalâ'oLla is said to carry a small woman in his arms. Her name is Nuspô'xta. When the brothers and their sister threaten to do harm to man, she entreats them to desist. In some traditions these deities are described as the children of ALk'unta'm.[1]

776 In one tradition L'ctsa'aplêLana' is described as visiting houses and 773 stealing provisions. She is then pursued by the person whom she has wronged, and returns to the House of Myths. The deities are unable to cure her; but the person who wounded her is called in, and withdraws his arrow, whereupon she recovers.[2] Formerly I had the impression that these [114] ten deities were particularly concerned with the sisau'k' ceremonial,[2] but this [575] impression has not been substantiated by the information I received during the past year. The ten deities appear much rather as deities of the kô'siut.

● 575 In the rear of the House of Myths there is a room named L'lô'sta, in 773 which the son of the deities lives. His name is Ba'gxôLla or Snupaaxola'lt.
776 When Sgnx and ALk'unta'm desire to destroy their visitors, they send them [772] past the door of Ba'gxôL'la's room. The latter then rushes out of his room and devours the visitors. He also initiates the Cannibal. According to the tradition of the tribe Se'nxLemx', they acquired membership in the Cannibal Society in the following manner: Ba'gxôLla came down to the mountain Sqsl., where he met with the son of Sgnxalo'Lela, the first of the tribe. He conducted him up to the House of Myths. He took him into his room, and gave him the name Q'oalaiu'tstimot. He put a snake into his body, which enabled him to pass through the water. When the youth applied his mouth to the body of a person, the snake tore pieces of flesh from the body, and devoured it. Then Ba'gxôLla took the youth to the upper heaven, past the rent in the sky, and to the house of the supreme deity, Qama'its. The two approached the house, being blown towards it by the strong gale prevailing in the open country of the upper heaven. They found Qama'its sitting in front of her house; and she said to Ba'gxôLla, "Why don't you come in? You wish that your friend should obtain great supernatural power. Bring him to my house, and I will give him what you desire. Stay for a short while where you are, and I will show you what I am doing. Watch closely when the post of my house closes its eyes." After a little while the post closed its eyes. It grew dark at once, and the two visitors fainted, but soon they recovered. When the post opened its eyes again, it grew light. The visitors remained sitting on the ground, and suddenly a strong wind began to blow, which rolled them over the prairie until they reached the door of the house. Then suddenly the wind calmed down. They remained sitting on the ground near the doorway; and Qama'its said, "Watch closely when the post of my house closes its eyes." They were sitting opposite each other, watching the post; and when it closed its eyes, they were transformed into two stones, but they soon regained human shape. Then Qama'its asked them to enter. Now the woman took the youth's blanket, and gave him another one made of bear-skin set with fringes of red cedar-bark. She told him that this blanket was to keep him warm, and that it would direct his course. Next she fetched some water from the salt-water pond behind her house. She sprinkled it over the faces of her visitors, and told the youth to sing about his experiences in the upper heaven when performing the Cannibal dance. If she had not sprinkled the faces of her visitors with water, they would have died. She said to the youth, "Your country is not far away. Do not be afraid of the dangerous road that you have to pass. Later on there shall be many Cannibals like you. Do not be afraid to touch the food that another Cannibal may offer to you. You are strong because you have seen me." Then Qama'its sent him back to the lower sky. Here the gods placed him on the back of a bird (Sq'xsEn), which carried him down to the sea. As soon as the bird reached the water, it uttered its cry, and at the same time the young man uttered the cry of the Cannibal. The people heard it, and said to one another, "That must be the boy whom we lost some time ago." They connected many canoes by means of planks, and paddled out to the place where the bird was swimming about. They covered the canoes with red cedar-bark and eagle-down, and tried to capture the youth; but when they approached, the bird swam towards the village. They surrounded it with their canoes; but the bird flew up, and disappeared in the sky, and at the same time the youth flew towards the village. When the people landed, he attacked them, taking hold of their arms; and the snake, which was still in his body, tore pieces of flesh out of their arms. The people sang and beat time in order to appease him.

In a second room in the rear of the House of Myths, next to that of the Cannibal, lives Kōkō'sLxEm, another son of the deities. His room is called Nus'ō'lxsta. He initiates the Olx-dancer (see Chap. VI).

The path of the Sun is guarded by a number of deities. At sunrise is stationed the Bear of Heaven, Snanō's ti Sōnx· t'aix· (Plate X, Fig. a). He is described as a fierce warrior, who protects the Sun against the attacks of his enemies, and he is the cause of the warlike spirit of man. His hair is tied up in a knot on top of his head. His mask is used in the sisau'k·

776 ceremonial, and sometimes in the kā'siut. The following song belongs to 575 his mask and dance:—

[539] Xsumō'ltsaxit ti q'ıqstl'mnt'nix'. Nō'nsq'ıwtsum ta'xn t'ıyōtsalat'nix' ıyunt unmō's ti xlnx' t'aix', wā, ōhō, ai!

("Cry now, as though you had left me! I shall tie up my hair, warriors, like the Bear of Heaven.")

776 821 At sunset stands an enormous post which is called Nutēexoa'axtatas ti Sōax' t'aix'. It supports the sky, and prevents the Sun from falling down into the lower world. The trail of the Sun is described as a bridge which was built by Masmasala'nix. The bridge is as broad as the distance between the winter solstice and the summer solstice. The Sun walks, his face turned towards the west. In summer he walks on the right-hand side of the bridge, in winter on the left-hand side of the bridge, which explains the varying heights of the sun in the course of the year. The extreme right and extreme left of the bridge are called Sē'ıxnt ("the place where he sits down," that is, the solstices). At each of these points a being is placed who is called Atk'xē'tlnem (Plate X, Fig. 3). It is their duty to see that the Sun does not tarry too long at the solstice. If in summer or winter he should be inclined to stay too long or to return too soon, they regulate his course. When the Sun tarries too long at the winter solstice, the people say, "ēx tsēs pa'nia" ("salmon will be dried late this year"). If he leaves it without tarrying, they say, "ēk!x' tsēs pa'nia" ("soon we shall dry salmon"). Three guardians named Naqumiqa'otsaix (Plate X, Fig. 1) accompany the Sun on his course, dancing around him all the time. The halo is called Itwu'xtsia ti Mānt. t'aix' ("the cape of our father"). A sun-[731] dog that appears westward from the Sun is called Atqōt. ti Mānt. t'aix' ("the [753] painted face of our father"). The Bella Coola believe that when it drops down to our earth, it causes epidemics. During an eclipse the Sun is believed to lose his torch. The rays of the Sun are his eyelashes.

There are twenty-four guardians appointed to take care of the sky. They are called Nexolak'al'x'. According to tradition, the sky must be continually fed with firewood. Once upon a time they put too much firewood into the sky and made it burst. All the pieces except one, called S'ıtlwalō'ıxm, fell down to our earth. The fragments hit the faces of the twenty-four guardians, and distorted them. They tried to mend the sky, but did not know how to do it. They went down the river, and came to Masmasala'nix, whose assistance they asked. Masmasala'nix gathered up the broken pieces, and glued them together. Up to that time the Sun had staid in the east, but now he began to go on his daily course. At that time Masmasala'nix built the bridge over which the Sun travels every day. He placed a wedge in the opening of the sky, into which the Nexolak'al'x'

Smayá'ots, that is considered a human being. It is said that his children make the canoe go up Bella Coola River with the rising tide, A'nxunk'ila. The canoe travels the distance from the mouth of the river to the mountain Smayá'ns in a single tide. The canoe "Nó'ak'nxem" stays for four months. Then the canoe "Kunkunu'qstula" returns from the country of the Salmon, while "Nó'ak'nxem" leaves again. It is said that all the gods of the House of Myths come to the villages of the Bella Coola in the canoe "Nó'ak'nxem." 773 [776]

The arrival and the departure of these canoes are strictly regulated according to the calendar of the Bella Coola, which for this reason should be explained in connection with their beliefs. The Bella Coola divide the year into two parts, which are separated by the winter and summer solstices. The solstices are periods of indefinite length, between which five months are counted. Each solstice is reckoned, therefore, as approximately six weeks. The names of the months are as follows: — 773 805 821

Sqa'ut (winter solstice)	Sqa'ut (summer solstice)
Sxóla'mx'nxem	Sl'ixem
[illegible]	Sexex'mut
Sinq'a'm	Sinuilh'hemtenxm
Sqóla'n	Tsl'ak'ítm [illegible] Anaólkuts'ai'x
Sinq'amak	[illegible]

The canoe "Nó'ak'nxem" arrives, and "Kunkunu'qstula" leaves, in the month Sinuilh'hemtenxm. The canoe "Nó'ak'nxem" leaves, and "Kunkunu'qstula" returns, in the month Sxóla'mx'nxem.

At the moment when the canoe "Nó'ak'nxem" arrives, a deity called Anaólkuts'ai'x (Plate XII, Figs. 1 and 2), who is believed to live in a cave, opens the door of her abode. There is one deity of this name to each village. Her cave is called Nuskéin'tsta. It is said that one Anaólkuts'ai'x lives on the mountain Sqtsi. Her house is described as a large hollow bowlder suspended from the top of the mountain by means of a rope. Each Anaólkuts'ai'x has an older sister who is called Nutsé'xenxm. When the canoe "Nó'ak'nxem" appears, and she opens her door, she steps outside and stands in front of her house, dancing, with trembling hands. When a person sees her, he faints. His soul is taken into her house, and is initiated into the secrets of the ku'sint. 773 776 [575]

A particular Nuskéin'tsta is believed to be at the foot of the creek Anó'nk', on the northern side of North Bentinck Arm, near the mouth of Bella Coola River. A woman called Nustsxoaxlo'stxnit, lives there. She is described as emaciated, of black skin, and as wearing a black blanket. A certain chief who lived long ago was the first to see her. He was initiated by her, and after his return he performed a dance, and told what he had seen. Then he died.

7:Boas E-5 (1884-ca. 1890)900 NEb Bellacoola NEb

Some of these he gives to the shaman. . . . A third spirit is the Skaia [Sual'exnex], which is believed to live in rivers, and to have the shape of a salmon. When a shaman who is inspired by this spirit makes an incantation in a house, singing and dancing, as all the shamans do, wherever approaches the house and hears the song turns back. They believe that whoever passes the house during the incantation will be punished with death by the spirit Skaia." 776 756

I believe this spirit is identical with LALAIT'E., who, as stated before, has the second name Sual'exnex. According to Jacobsen, some shamans are initiated by the ghosts. He says that the ghosts are believed to have bald heads and blue faces. I am under the impression, however, that the people initiated by them are not shamans, but ka'xiat dancers (see Chap. VI). [775] [575]

Another being who initiates shamans is described in the following tradition: — 539

Once upon a time there was a man and a woman who had four sons. The three elder ones died. Then the father and mother and the youngest brother were very unhappy, and the old people cried for grief until they died. The young man was now left all alone. He left his village, intending to go away and never to return. He pulled his blanket over his head and walked on. Sometimes he would stop to pray. He lived on the meat of mountain-goats which he shot. He built a small hut high up on the mountains, and dried the meat. He was crying and praying all the time. He prayed to the Sun to give him a gift which would restore his happiness. One day early in the morning he ascended the mountain. He addressed the rising Sun, saying, "Look at me, how unhappy I am." After he had gone a short distance he came to a ravine. The bed of the ravine was filled with pretty pebbles. There he met a beautiful man, who was no other than the Sun, who had descended from the sky. He had caused the water of the creek that runs through the ravine to disappear. When the young man saw the stranger from a distance, he thought, "He seems to be looking for me." He went nearer; and when they met, the Sun said, "I am the one to whom you are praying all the time, and I came to help you. Now be happy. When you open your mouth and speak to me, I know your thoughts at once. I help those who address themselves to me. Take this." With these words he handed the young man a switch carved in the shape of a man. The Sun was carrying it under his arm, the point of the switch directed downward. "Fold your arms and hold this switch to your chest, and then return to the village. When you approach anyone, hide the switch under your arm. You will find a person who wears a nose-ornament of beautiful green color. Then you must try to hit the ornament with this switch, and throw it to your right side." 756 776

7:Boas E-5 (1886-ca. 1890)1900 NE6 Bellacoola NE6

They had hit a stone, and their points were broken. He staid there some time, and when it was nearly dark he returned home. Before he reached his house, he cut his own belly and took out some of the fat from his intestines. He cut it in five pieces, and replaced his intestines. He put the fat into his quiver. When he reached his house, he hung the quiver up outside, and entered. He imitated everything the Lynx had done. When it grew dark, he told his wife to fetch his quiver. She brought it, and he told her to open it and to feed his children. She took the fat out, placed it on a stick, and put it near the fire: and as soon as it grew warm, the Raven cried, "Tttt! Don't put it so near the fire. I feel sick when you do so." He jumped up, took hold of the fat, and put it back in his belly. The Lynx said, "Formerly I fed your children, but you were the first not to treat me properly. You did not give any food to my children." Then the Lynx took some fat, and flung one piece to each of the Raven's children. He cut some meat and gave it to them also. Then the Raven said, "I will give you one of my children, that it may grow up in company with yours." 539 776

It is said that the former spirit Toa'lat.'it was killed at one time by an Indian who took his place. This tale is recorded in Chap. IV. It belongs to the tribe of the village Nusxe'q!. A similar tradition is told of Astas,[1] by which name the Carriers call the Raven, their principal culture hero. Many traditions referring to Astas are common to the Carriers, the Bella Coola, and the Awi'k-'enôx of Rivers Inlet. 773 776 [170]

The Bella Coola believe that a being called K'tsôs is the father of all mountain-goats. When a hunter meets him, he thinks he sees a kid. Then he should close his eyes and open them again. If the animal is K'tsôs, it will appear in its real shape as a buck of enormous size. The hunter should then ascend the mountain. If he should descend, he would fall and die. 776 825

The thunder-storm is produced by the Thunder-bird, who lives on the mountains, in the company of a number of spirits, who are considered his particular friends. The Thunder-bird himself is represented by a black mask with red nostrils. The nose is strongly curved, the forehead bulges forward, and the chin protrudes almost as far forward as the nose (Plate XI, Fig. 1). His herald is called A.xula'tenum (Plate XI, Fig. 2). His face is painted with orange and blue stripes, and he carries a speaker's staff, which is painted with spirals of the same color. He watches the door of the Thunder-bird's house. In his house live the Rabbit (Plate XI, Fig. 3); the Owl, who is considered the rival of the Thunder-bird (Plate XI, Fig. 4); the Mountain, L.e'qots (Plate XI, Fig. 5); the Raindrop (Plate XI, Fig. 6). 776 [621] [532] [575]

776 The Thunder-bird and his companions appear in the kō'siut ceremonial. When they enter the house, a dancer appears who carries an instrument in 575 the shape of a bird-rattle (Plate XI, Fig. 7), which is provided with holes [534] in its lower side, and has a loose back. This implement is filled with cedar-bark and eagle-down, and is shaken by the dancer. The eagle-down is thus made to fly about in the house, symbolizing the wealth and power of the Thunder-bird.

184 In the preceding pages I have summarized the principal features of 773 Bella Coola mythology, which are characteristic of the traditions of the whole tribe. Besides these, there are other groups of traditions which are very conflicting. One reason for the existence of numerous contradictory traditions must be looked for in the peculiar social organization of the Bella Coola. In former times, when the tribe was populous, the Bella Coola inhabited a great many villages. The inhabitants of each village are considered the descendants of a number of mythical ancestors who were sent down by SENX. Each of these village communities has traditions of its own, which are its property, and which are not well known to the rest of the tribe. Many of these traditions refer to the origin of our world, and for this reason a number of the most important myths differ in various villages. Indications of such conflicting ideas may be found in the traditions recorded in the preceding pages. To make this subject clear, it is necessary to describe somewhat fully the traditions belonging to a number of village communities. Before recording these traditions I shall enumerate the villages of the tribe.
103 The following list is the result of repeated inquiries. In it the names and 361 locations of the villages are given in consecutive order from the mouth of Bentinck Arm upward along Bella Coola River, and the names of the 773 mythical ancestors of the village communities have been added where these have been ascertained.

Village.	Location.	Ancestors.
1. Q'oā'ıaa	At the bay of this name.
2. Sx'ıia	At the entrance of South Bentinck Arm.	Tōtsō'ıa.
3. Nusxē'q!	On North Bentinck Arm.	Sxnuiata'k'ıa, Nusqua'-xlsnē, Sx'ists, and their sister E'ıa.'xlsana.
4. Pē'ıszla	At the entrance of the valley opening on the north side of the mouth of Bella Coola River.	Sxē'homs, Yuyō'lk', Mystai'i, Sisō'i.
5. Atqla'xi.	The present division at the north side of Bella Coola River, near its mouth.	Iuyō'yōi, Xemsē'ıuts-xem, Sinxnsla'h, and their sister Iuqsē'ıuts.

000 the middle of the water, the barnacles and worms bit her. She jumped up, and the canoe capsized. The birds swam ashore. After a short time the barnacles and sea-worms came ashore too. They looked very stout, because they had eaten the bear. Then the youth said to the girl, "There are two trails here,—one leading to the left, the other to the right. You follow the one, I will follow the other. If the trails meet, we will marry; if they do not, we here separate forever. They started, and after a while met each other. Then the youth married the girl. (Mask of the Bear, Plate X, Fig. 11.)[1]

12 It is necessary to make a few remarks on the relation of the ceremonials 796 of the Bella Coola Indians to their mythology. I have not seen any of their ceremonials, and my descriptions are based on inquiries, and upon the accounts [124] published by Fillip and Adrian Jacobsen.

The Bella Coola have two ceremonials,—the sisau'k and the ku'siut, which 796 correspond to the ła'łaxa and the ts'etsa'eqa of the Kwakiutl. I have described these ceremonials fully in another paper.[2] The sisau'k ceremonials 575 are mostly dramatic representations illustrating the clan legends, some of which have been recorded in Chap. IV, while the ku'siut ceremonials are dramatic representations of the initiation of members of various clans into certain secret societies. Among these, the Cannibal Society, the Society of the Laughers, and the Society of the Throwers, are the most important.
These are called by the Bella Coola the xlaxo'łała, Ots, and Da'tis. I described on pp. 34, 35, the spirits presiding over the two first-named 114 societies. The information which I obtained on these points is perfectly 575 clear and consistent. I cannot quite reconcile the explanations given by 776 A. and F. Jacobsen to the accounts which I received. It seems that their accounts do not clearly distinguish between the opinions held by various 796 tribes. In the article above referred to, I described fully the opinions held by the Kwakiutl in regard to the origin of their Cannibal Society. They believe that a spirit called Baxbakualanuxsi'wae initiates the Cannibals. He is represented as having an enormous black head with dilated nostrils and large mouth. I have made frequent inquiries among the Bella Coola, but received the uniform answer that this being does not initiate their Cannibals.
It is not impossible that a few families may have adopted this tradition from the Kwakiutl tribes, but I have not been able to find it among the Bella Coola. Jacobsen maintains that Baxbakualanuxsi'wae is the particular spirit of the Cannibal among the Bella Coola, and brings forward the well-known tradition of the Awi'k'enox as an explanation of the ceremonial. The only modification which I note in this tradition is that the Cannibal's wife is described as sucking out through their ears the brains of children,—an incident which I heard related of the mother of A.k'nnt'm.[1] He calls him "Beck-Beck-Kvalanit, and in the Bella Coola dialect, Pth-Pth Kualanuiva." This word is decidedly of Kwakiutl origin, meaning "the one who eats human flesh at the mouth of the river (or at the north end of the world)." Neither have I been able to find any mask representing this being among the Bella Coola tribe. The masks which they use in connection with the Cannibal ceremony are of quite a different character (Plate XII, Figs. 1-8). I am the more inclined to think that Mr. Jacobsen did not clearly distinguish between the customs and traditions of various tribes, since he introduces "Gaskilhaq[illegible] (q'nig'ilak')" in the traditions of the Bella Coola, while it is distinctively a legend of the Kwakiutl tribes of the extreme northwest of Vancouver Island. Jacobsen does not distinguish clearly between the sisau'k' and the ka'niut, stating that the ka'niut dances are performed during the sisau'k' in the same way as, among the Kwakiutl, a LAO'laxa may be celebrated during the ta'a'ta'aqa. This may be, but theoretically the two ceremonials must be considered entirely distinct. According to the information which I received, sisau'k' dances may be held in summer, in which case the ka'niut could not possibly form part of the sisau'k' ceremonial. When, on the other hand, the sisau'k' takes place during the ka'niut period, it would naturally be accompanied by ka'niut dances.

As stated before, the sisau'k' is a ceremonial in which the legend of the clan is illustrated by means of dramatic performances. At the same time valuable presents are distributed among the guests who are invited to witness the ceremonial. The value of the gifts amounts often to several thousand dollars. At this time the family legend is told in general outlines, but the details of the legend are kept a secret, and are transmitted only to those who are initiated in the sisau'k' of the clan. It seems that we must consider the transmission of the sisau'k' legend in the following manner: At any given time it is the property of the chief of the family, who, at the time of the celebration, transfers his rights to his successor, generally to his son. The full tradition is kept secret by the owner. It seems that there is a close analogy between the conditions prevailing in the northwest and those found among the southwestern Indians, among whom certain priests are guardians of traditions. Among the tribes of the northwest coast the chief of a family is the guardian and owner of the family tradition, while among the southwestern tribes the priest is the guardian of the tradition belonging to a clan or to a fraternity. My impression is, however, that among the northwestern

1424 Indians the tradition is considered much more clearly the property of the 575 person who has it in charge than it is among the southwestern Indians. A description of the sisau'k ceremonial has been given by Jacobsen in the paper above referred to.[1]

604 A clan legend which is illustrated in the sisau'k ceremonial is called 424 by the Bella Coola "Semsma" or "Smt'yusta." These traditions are the exclusive property of each clan. The laws according to which they descend from generation to generation differ from the laws prevailing among the other [621] Coast tribes. The inhabitants of each Bella Coola village are not subdivided into clans, gentes, or septs; but each village community forms a unit, and possesses the same tradition. In order to keep the tradition in the tribe, the 614 law requires that no person shall marry outside of his own village community.
429 Thus the clan tradition is kept the exclusive property of the village com-582 munity by means of endogamy. I have made very careful inquiries in regard to this point, and all the old men make substantially the same statement.
Even marriages among near relatives are permitted;[2] and although marriages of people who are distantly related, or not related at all, are preferred, it even happens that cousins marry, or that an uncle marries his niece, in order to keep the clan tradition from being acquired by another village community.
It seems, however, that, owing to the influence of the Coast tribes, the [622] endogamic system has begun to give way to an exogamic system. Powerful and wealthy chiefs marry outside of their own village community, in order to secure an additional clan legend through marriage. This new system agrees with the one prevalent among the Kwakiutl tribes.

575 The ka'xlat, as stated before, is a religious ceremony in which all the 614 deities of heaven are personified. The members of various clans are initiated 796 according to their clan traditions; but the same societies and the same deities appear in the traditions of all the various clans. From what little I have been able to learn, it seems that there is an elaborate opening of the whole ceremonial, corresponding to the opening of the ceremonial among the Kwakiutl.[2] I received the following description of the opening ceremony:—

575 The person who invites to the ka'xlat, that is to say, the man whose 796 son is to be initiated into one of the secret societies according to the tradition of his clan, requests a person who is called E'xtem to invite the nine brothers and their sister, who reside in the House of Myths, and in whose charge the [776] ka'xlat is placed. The names of the brothers are Xemxemsla'ts.la, Xe'mxiwa, Omq'omk'lk'a, Q'o'mxiwa, Aimsla'ts.la, Al'omk'lk'a, K'ela'lisa, Q'ulaxa'wa, Al'omk'; and that of their sister, L'tsa'xpilsana (see p. 33). In the rear of the house an elevated room is prepared for E'xtem, in which he lies down.
He is covered with rings made of red cedar-bark. For four days he stays in this room. Then the host sends messengers to invite the people. They take staffs, and tie red cedar-bark round their heads, and go from house to house, singing, "Nayaxdets wa nonosp'otstsé' he!" ("I wish to find some one who understands the winter ceremonial.") This they repeat in every house. Then they return to the host's house, who sends them out again, ordering them to sing, "Qots'ak·im tstets wa nonosp'otstsé' he!" ("I wish the dancers would wash their hands.") Again they return to his house. They are sent out once more with the message, "Xo'tsak·omstets wa nonosp'otstsé' he!" ("I wish the dancers would make their hands tremble.") They return once more to the chief's house, and are sent out again with the message, "Tapamak·tets wa nonosp'otstsé' he!" ("I want the dancers to look at their hands.") Now the dancers are ready, and come to the house. Then É'xem arises and dresses. He puts on a head-dress of birds' skins, ornamented with red cedar-bark. He is accompanied by women. Another man, who is called Nuax·ia'mi., adorns himself with red cedar-bark. He carries in his right hand a small baton covered with red cedar-bark. In his left he carries a larger stick, on which he beats time with the small baton. He sits down, and now all the people enter. First of all, É'xem comes in, accompanied by many women. Nuax·ia'mi. begins to sing and to beat time, and É'xem shouts, "Ooo!" É'xem walks around the fire, keeping it to his left, and shaking his bark. Before he begins the circuit, he gives four jumps near the door. Four times he goes round the fire, and every time he reaches the door he gives four jumps. As soon as he does so, Nuax·ia'mi. beats time slowly. When É'xem has finished his dance, the people take him to a place near the door, and a woman sings near him. Nuax·ia'mi. and the people join her, then she dances her winter dance. Before she quite finishes, the people make her stop, and another woman begins her dance. Nuax·ia'mi. beats time, and the other people join his song. The people make her stop again. Thus a great many people perform their dances. Now É'xem appears again, crying, "Ooo!" and Nuax·ia'mi. beats time. Again he jumps four times to the right and four times to the left when reaching the door. After this, two more men and two more women perform their dances. After this has been done twice, É'xem stands near the door, looking upward, and says, "They are very near now." By this time the whole house is full of people. He goes around the house three times, dancing. Then he stays near the door, looking upward, saying all the time, "They are near by." When he reaches the door the fourth time, he cries, "They have arrived! Now they are here, dancing on the roof." É'xem continues to dance in the house, in order to induce them to come down. The first to come down is Xemxemala'o.la, who stops at the rear of the house and sits down. É'xem continues to dance, and the others enter in order. É'xem stands near them and says, "Now I have placed them. Let the chief give them red cedar-bark." The people take small pieces of blankets, and sew red cedar-bark on to them in designs corresponding to the paintings on the faces of these deities, and they give these to the deities in order to appease them. Then they throw grease into the fire. During all this time E'xtem stands in the rear of the house; and when a painting has been finished, the man who offers it to the deity shouts, "Xemsemsnit'ts.ln t'ais'ten'!" ("This is Xemsemsnit'ts.ln.") And E'xtem sings, "Yayak'tamen'tk'a wa k'wsnsnsnt'a'ns, t'ais' ta'ya; ma'ns.'a'nsnsnsnts sank'nsinsnsnt'a sank'nsinsnsnts'ya." As soon as he has finished his song, a loud noise is heard on the roof, as though a heavy stone were falling down. E'xtem arises and performs a dance, while the noise of whistles is heard proceeding from him.

I am not familiar with the details of the ceremonial, and shall proceed to record the principal characteristics of the various societies. The Cannibal is initiated in the House of Myths by Ba'xxts.ln. I recorded above (p. 34) how a young man was initiated by this spirit, and how he was returned to his friends. The return of the Cannibal is accompanied by ceremonies similar to those recorded in the tradition. It seems that the ceremonies of the Cannibals of various families are much alike, each having a tradition of its own referring to the initiation. It is believed that all the Cannibals, during their initiation, go up to the sky. I was told that on this journey they have to take human flesh along for food. It is said that in former times the chiefs held a council the night preceding the beginning of the ceremonies, and any one who wanted to show his liberality offered one of his slaves to be killed in order to serve as food for Ba'xxts.ln. The offer was accepted, and a payment made for the slave. The latter was killed, and the members of the Ba'xxts.ln order devoured one-half of the body before the departure of the novice to the woods.

The spirit appears to the novice while he is in the woods, and takes him up to the House of Myths, where he is initiated. Early one morning he returns, and is heard outside of the houses. He has lost all his hair except a little in the median line of the head. It is believed that it has been torn off by the strong wind blowing in the higher regions. Some Cannibals do not devour human flesh, but tear dogs to pieces or devour raw salmon. The ceremonial consists in purifying the Cannibal, and exorcising the spirit that possesses him. This is the object of the ka'xlat ceremonial. After a Cannibal has returned, the people try to capture him. When he is first heard to approach, the speaker, whose face is painted black, and who wears a cedar-bark ring, and is covered with eagle-down, shouts, "Tla'ma'n'ns tak'xxm'l.ln, tam,'a'nm'al. P'ala'xxmlsnsnsnt' tla'ma'n'ns mskwsnk'l.ln. t'an,'ainm'a'l!" ("Arise, it may be our Cannibal. Awake!") The Cannibal is accompanied by four assistants, who are called Ala'ps, and who from time to time utter

9:Boas B.5 (BBS-ca.1895)/900 NBS Bellacoola NBS

the cry, "Hoop!" which is intended to pacify the Cannibal. They wear masks (Plate XII, Figs. 4 and 5). The people try to throw a mouse over his head; but he throws it off, refusing to be captured. Then the people shout, "Ya'i!" beating time rapidly. The Cannibal tears the ropes that hold him, and disappears. Then the people follow him, and search for him until they find him. As soon as they approach, he attacks them, but gradually he becomes quieter. Then the speaker (Alk') invites the people to the dancing-house, saying, "Ip'a'sap kakuisa'i!" That means, "Dance, dancers!" Now the Cannibal opens the door, accompanied by his assistants. He wears the mask shown in Plate XII, Fig. 3. At once a number of women arise, ready to surround him as soon as he enters the house. They are called Alas.'ne'i.tsmex. The speaker, who holds a staff, arises and shouts, "O a ya'lo-wainuxtx Alqta.ayak'ai's!" That means, "Act like a real Cannibal." The Cannibal utters his cry, "Hoaxa, hoaxa, hoaxa!" ending with a long deep growl. He stays in the doorway for a long time. Then he steps into the house, turns his left shoulder outward once, bites one man on the right-hand side of the house, and one on the left-hand side, and then performs his circuit of the fire, leaving the fire to his left. In dancing he holds his fists in front of his chest, one on each side. He moves in a stooping position, raising his feet very high. He dances for four nights, during which time the people try to pacify him by means of songs and dances. After he has first been induced to enter the house, he becomes quieter. Then he tells the people what he has seen during his absence, and the song-leader makes a song on the subject. The women do not learn about the events that took place during his absence until they hear the song. After four days the ceremony of exorcising the S'a'.qata (Plate XII, Figs. 6 and 7), the monster that possesses him, is performed. A large dish is ornamented with red cedar-bark; and the assistant of the S'a'.qata (Plate XII, Fig. 8), by means of incantations, makes the Cannibal vomit the snake, or the wolf, or the eagle, that possesses him. Then he is seen to carry the head of the animal under his left arm, while the body is seen in the rear, being held by his assistants. Then this animal is seen to vomit flesh and blood into the dish which has been prepared for the purpose. The Cannibal's assistants cover the body of the animal with down, while they cry from time to time, "Hoop!" Then the people beat time very rapidly, and suddenly the S'a'.qata has disappeared. The people beat time four times, and after this the Cannibal has become like an ordinary man. He walks around the fire, which he keeps to his right, and says, "Now Sa'xaxa.is has left me." The contents of the dish are thrown into the water, but the dish itself is burned in the dancing-house. It is supposed that it is then conveyed to heaven. After the dish has been burned, the Cannibal does not dance any more. Then a bed is prepared for him in the rear of the house, in which he must stay for four days. After this, he is allowed to re-enter the houses; but before doing so for the first time, he must stop at the door and shout, "Wa, wa, wa!" Then he jumps over the threshold. Accompanied by many men, he is led, after four days more, to the river for final purification. He is pushed into the water, but struggles to free himself. He tries to duck his companions, and utters his cries. Finally he is led back. Then he weeps, because the spirit has left him entirely. The people beat time while he is going back to the house. Then he is offered a piece of salmon, which is placed on his throat, while the people shout, "Hoip, hoip!" The salmon is taken away again, and after some time he is allowed to take one bite. Then he must lie down. After the dancing season is ended, he is again allowed to eat in the same way as other people do. The piece of salmon that was placed on his throat is eaten by children as a protection against sickness. Finally a ceremony is performed which is called "taking the lip of the S'ā'ī.qata out of the Cannibal's body." While this is being done, the people cry, "Hoip!" Then they throw the lip upon another Cannibal, who at once falls into an ecstasy. Then the shaman takes it back and throws it up towards the sky, where it disappears. The dish and the spoon that the Cannibal used during his ecstasy are destroyed. For four years he must wear a small ring of red cedar-bark, in summer as well as in winter.

The Ōtx is also initiated in heaven by the being described before (p. 35). There are different traditions regarding his initiation among different clans. Some Ōtx, during their performances, walk ropes which are stretched through the house. When he returns from his initiation, small whistles, called ea.ʼlaxa, which imitate the voices of eagles, are heard outside of the houses. Then the Ōtx enters in a state of ecstasy, scratching the people who assemble to hold him, and tearing their blankets. Finally the people succeed in placing a blanket over his head, and he begins to come to his senses. When he enters the house, the people beat time, then he teaches the chorus-leader a song. The mask worn by the Ōtx is quite large, and characterized by a large nose (Plate XII, Fig. 9). He carries a dancing-club (Plate XII, Fig. 10), and rings made of red cedar-bark. He is accompanied by two assistants, who also wear masks.

VII.

We will now discuss the probable origin of the mythology described in the preceding pages. In order to do so, it is necessary to make a brief statement in regard to the social organization of the neighboring tribes. In another paper[1] I have fully discussed the considerable amount of borrowing that has taken place among the Coast tribes, and the relation of their

[1] Ethnologische Gegenstände aus der nordpacifischen Küste Amerikas, Berlin, 1895, pp. 41 et seq.

7:Boas E.5 (1884-ca.1890)900 NEA Bellacoola NES

174 contradiction is inherent in all the mythologies of the North Pacific coast, 424 they nowhere reach such a degree as among the Bella Coola; and I presume 414 the fact that the traditions are kept secret by the various families accounts for this curious condition.

The prayers of the Bella Coola directed to Sanx or Ta'ata bear a 171 remarkable resemblance to the prayers of the Tsimshian addressed to Laxha, 782 the sky. In both tribes we find the idea that when the Sun wipes his face it will be clear weather, and man will be happy; consequently the prayer to [824] the deity "to wipe his face" occurs quite often.

One of the most important customs that the Bella Coola borrowed from 177 the Coast tribes is the kə'siut ceremonial, with which are connected the various secret societies, particularly the custom of ceremonial cannibalism.
575 The ceremonies and the paraphernalia used by the Bella Coola and by the 773 Kwakiutl are practically identical. I told above (p. 34) the legend explaining 786 the origin of cannibalism. Among the Bella Bella and Kwakiutl, another tradition is told to explain the origin of this custom. The tradition tells of a spirit called Baxbakualanuxsi'wae, who lives in the forest, and who initiates the members of the Cannibal Society. The series of traditions clustering around this being differ fundamentally from those referring to the Cannibal Society of the Bella Coola. The custom has also spread to the Tsimshian, who say that the secret societies were introduced by a hunter who was taken into the inside of a cliff by a white bear. Inside he saw a house, in which the various societies were performing their ceremonies. It appears, therefore, that the same ritual which is practised by three distinct tribes is explained by three fundamentally distinct myths; and we must conclude that in this case the ritual is older than the myth,—that the latter has been invented in order to explain customs that were borrowed from foreign tribes, so that the ritual is the primary phenomenon, while the myth is secondary.[1]

These considerations explain some of the psychological motives for the 174 development of certain traditions and myths, as well as the curious incon-773 sistency of the clan traditions of the Bella Coola. They do not, however, explain the most fundamental characteristic of the traditions of the tribe. I pointed out in the third chapter of this paper, that, notwithstanding the numerous contradictions contained in family legends, the conception of the word and the functions of the various deities are so well defined that we must consider the mythology of this tribe vastly superior to that of the neighboring tribes. While the latter believe in a great many spirits which are not co-ordinated, we have here a system of deities. The existence of a systematic mythology among the Bella Coola proves that under favorable conditions the advance from the lower forms of beliefs to higher forms may be a very rapid one.

every morning when the sun rises. He takes care that he rises properly. The first six of these deities are grouped in pairs, and are 556 773 776 believed to paint their faces with designs representing moon, stars, and rainbow. In the kū'siut these deities make their appearance, and are represented by masks. Xē'mtsioa and Xēmxēmalà'oLa wear the 532 design of the full moon, indicated on the mask of Xē'mtsioa by a 575 double curved line in red and black, the black outside, passing over 776 forehead, cheeks, and upper lip. Xēmxēmalà'oLa has a double curved line in red and black, the red outside, which passes over forehead, cheeks, and chin. Aiumkī'lik·a and Aiumalà'oLa wear the design of the crescent, drawn in red and black, with differences similar to those between the first and second masks. The fifth Q'ōmq'ōmkī'lik·a and Q'ō'mtsioa have designs representing stars, both wearing the same style of mask. The seventh is Qula'xawa, whose face represents the blossom of a salmon-berry bush. The next in order, Kulē'lias (who wants to have blankets first), wears the design of the rainbow in black and blue. The ninth, At'amā'k, wears on the head a mask representing a kingfisher, and is clothed in a bird-skin blanket. The last of the series is a woman called L'ētsā'aplēLāna (the eater), the sister of the others. Her face is painted with the design of a bladder filled with grease. She figures in several legends as stealing provisions and pursued by the people whom she has robbed.

The sisau'k·, which is danced at potlatches and other festivals of 575 the clans, is presided over by a being that lives in the sun. A man who 773 had gone out hunting met the sisau'k· and was instructed by him in the 776 secrets of the dance. When he returned, he asked the people to clean 796 their houses and to strew them with clean sand before he consented to enter. Then he danced the sisau'k· and told the people what he had seen. He said that the being had commanded them to perform this dance and to adorn themselves when dancing with carved headdresses with trails of ermine skins, and to swing carved rattles. The man, later on, returned to the sun. Ever since that time the Bi'lxula dance the sisau'k·. Besides this, it is stated that the raven gave each clan its 614 secrets. Each clan has its peculiar carvings, which are used in the 424 sisau'k· only, and are otherwise kept a profound secret, i. e., they are 532 the sacred possessions of each clan. All clans, however, wear the beautiful carved headdresses and use the raven rattles, regardless of the [592] [534] carving they represent. Every time the sacred objects of a clan are shown to the people a potlatch is given. The sacred objects, although 424 the property of the various clans, must nevertheless be acquired by 532 each individual—that is to say, every free person has the right to 556 acquire a certain group of carvings and names, according to the clan 614 to which he or she belongs. Slaves and slaves' children, also illegitimate children, can not become sisau'k·. A person can not take a [567] [848] new carving, but must wait until it is given to him by his relatives—father, mother, or elder brother. Nusk'Elu'stta, the Indian, to whom I [115]

8:Boas E-5 (1886-ca. 1890)1897
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

424 owe my information regarding the clans, and who is a member of the 532 gens Ialô'stimôt of the Taliô'mx·, stated that he had received the raven 614 when he gave his first potlatch. At his second potlatch he received [115] the eagle. He hoped that his mother would give him the whale at his [556] next potlatch, and would at the same time divulge to him the secrets connected with it. In course of time, he said, he might get even others from his brother; but if the latter's children should prove to be very good, and develop very rapidly, his brother would probably give his 424 secrets to his own children. At festivals, when a person acquires a new 551 secret, he changes his name. Each person has two names, a kū'siut 556 name, which remains through life, and a Xē'mtsioa name, which is 575 changed at these festivals. Thus, Nusk'Elu'sta's (which is his kū'siut 614 name) Xē'mtsioa name was AL'ILEMNE'lus'aix·, but at his next potlatch he intended to take the name of Kaliā'kis. These names are also the property of the various clans, each clan having its own names. When a man possesses several sisau'k· secrets, he will distribute them among his children. When a girl marries, her father or mother may, after a child has been born to her, give one or several of their sisau'k· secrets to her husband, as his children make him a member of her clan. When a person grows old, he gives away all his sisau'k· secrets. After any secret has been given away the giver must not use it any more.
[426] The crest and the sisau'k· carvings must not be loaned to others, but each person must keep his own carvings. The only exceptions are the carved headdresses and the raven rattles, which are not the property of any particular clan.

426 The laws regarding the potlatch are similar to those of the Kwakiutl.
556 The receiver of a present becomes the debtor of the person who gave the potlatch. If the latter should die, the debts become due to his heirs. If the debtor should die, his heirs become responsible for the debt. Property is also destroyed at potlatches. This is not returned, and serves only to enhance the social position of the individual who performed this act. It is not necessary that all the property given by a person in a potlatch should be owned by him. He may borrow part of it from his friends, and has to repay it with interest. I was told, for instance, that a man borrowed a large copper plate and burnt it at a potlatch. When doing so, he had to name the price which he was going to pay the owner in its stead. Since that feast he died, and his heirs are now responsible for the amount named at the potlatch.

575 The kū'siut is presided over by a female spirit, called Anaālikuta'- 773 ai'x·. Her abode is a cave in the woods, which she keeps shut from 776 February till October, remaining all the while inside. In October she opens the door of her cave and sits in front of it. A woman is said to 535 have been the first to find her. Anaālikuta'ai'x· invited her into her cave and taught her the secrets of the kū'siut. She wore ornaments of red cedar bark around her head, waist, and ankles; her face was blackened, her hair strewn with eagle down. She commanded the woman to dance in the same way as she saw her dancing. The people should accompany her dance with songs, and, after she had finished, they should dance with masks. She said, "Whenever a person sees me, your people shall dance the kū'siut. If you do not do so, I shall punish you with death and sickness. In summer, while I am in my house, you must not dance the kū'siut." 575 773 776 535

8:Boas E-5 (1886-ca. 1890)1897
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

Ever since that time the Bi'lxula dance the kū'siut. When a man has seen Anaūlikuts'ai'x· sitting in front of her cave, he will invite the people to a kū'siut. A ring made of red and white cedar bark is hung up in his house, and the uninitiated are not allowed to enter it. Only in the evening, when dances are performed, they may look on, standing close to the door. As soon as the dances are over, they must retire from the taboo house. Each kū'siut lasts three days. 575 776 535

The various dances performed by members of the kū'siut are also property of the clans, and the right to perform them is restricted to members of the clan. They must not be given to a daughter's husband, as is the case with the sisau'k· dances, but belong to the members of the clan, who have a right to a particular dance, but who do not own it. Permission to use a mask or dance is obtained from the owner by payments. The owner may reclaim the dance or the borrower may return it at any time. Membership of the kū'siut is obtained through an initiation. At this time the novice is given his kū'siut name, which is inherited by young persons from their parents or from other relatives. Thus a young man who had the name of Pō'pō until he was about seventeen years old, obtained at his initiation the name of L'akō'oL. I have not reached a very clear understanding of the details of the initiation; it seems that the dance is simply given to the novice in the same way as the sisau'k·, this initiation being connected with a potlatch. But still it seems possible that he must "dream" of the dance which he is to perform. Only the highest degrees of the kū'siut have to pass through a religious ceremony of some importance. The highest degrees are the ELaxō'LA (the hā'mats'a of the Kwakiutl), the ō'lEX (the nū'LmaL of the Kwakiutl), and the dā'tis (the nō'ntsistalaL of the Kwakiutl). These grades are also hereditary. A kū'siut novice may acquire them at once at his first initiation. 535 575 575 614 575 [426] [551] [428] [556] [171] [554]

When the ELaxō'LA is initiated, he goes into the forest, where he encounters his guardian spirit. It is believed that he goes up to the sun, and formerly he had to take human flesh along for food. The chiefs held a council the night preceding the beginning of the ceremonies, and anyone who wanted to show his liberality offered one of his slaves to be killed in order to serve as food for the ELaxō'LA. The offer was accepted, and a payment of from ten to twenty blankets was made for the slave. The latter was killed, and the members of the ELaxō'LA order devoured one-half of the body before the departure of the novice to the woods. There the latter was tied up and left to fast. He may stay there for twenty or thirty days until the spirit appears 575 785 787 [266]

575 to him and takes him up to the sun, where he is initiated. Early one [785] morning he returns, and is heard outside the houses. He has lost all [787] his hair, which, it is believed, has been torn out by the strong breeze
[52] blowing in the higher regions. He is quite naked, and bites everyone [774] whom he can lay hold of. If he can not catch anyone he will bite his [756] own arm. It is believed that he has lost his soul, which fled from the [292] body when the spirit came to him. Therefore the shamans must try [301] for four days to recapture his soul. The night after they have recovered it the ELAXŌ'LA dances, clothed in a bearskin and wearing a large head ring, heavy bracelets and anklets, all made of red cedar bark. Sometimes he appears wearing the mask of the S'Ā'LPSTA (fig. 200), the spirit which initiated him. This mask corresponds exactly to that [532] of BaxbakuālanuXsī'wnē of the Kwakiutl. Some ELAXŌ'LA do not [171] bite people, but merely devour raw salmon or tear dogs to pieces and devour them. Those who bite people will also devour corpses. The ELAXŌ'LA has to observe a number of regulations. For four years after his initiation he must not [266]
[525]
[834]
gamble. He must stay away from his wife for one year, but this period is being reduced to one month. For two or three months he must not leave his house.

Fig. 200.
MASK OF THE S'Ā'LPSTA. Bi'kals.
Cat. No. 19909, U. S. N. M. Collected by F. Boas.

The Ō'LEX (the laugher) and the dā'tia (the thrower) do not go into the woods to be initiated, but both must fast three days before their first dance. The Ō'LEX "makes fun of everything" and scratches people with his nails. The dā'tia carries stones and sticks and breaks household goods and canoes. If he has destroyed some object during the day, he pays for it at night when he dances. The Ō'LEX and the dā'tia, after they have danced, must stay in their houses for one month.

575 If a person transgresses the laws of the kū'siut, for instance, when 688 the ELAXŌ'LA gambles, or when a man performs a dance to which he has no right, also when a person derides the ceremonies or makes a mistake in dancing, his punishment is death. The chiefs assemble in [692] council and the offender is called before the court. After his offense has been proved, he is asked whether he is willing to suffer the penalty of death. If he is not willing and one of his relatives is found willing 575 to take the penalty on himself, the guilty party is spared and the sub-688 stitute killed in his stead. The execution of the judgment is intrusted 754 to the shaman, who bewitches the condemned person by throwing dis-756 ease into him or by poisoning him in some other (supernatural?) way. The object thrown by the shaman is a shell, bone, or finger nail, around the middle of which objects a human hair is tied. If this object strikes the offender, he will fall sick. Blood is believed to collect in his stomach, and if it so happens that he vomits this blood, and with it the disease-producing object, he will recover, and is not molested any further. The masks (not the whistles and other ornaments) used in the kū'siut are burnt immediately at the close of each dancing season. Novices must wear a necklace of red cedar bark over their blankets for a whole year. The masks used in the dances represent mythical personages, and the dances are pantomimic representations of myths. Among others, the thunder bird and his servant, ALxulā'tEnum (who wears a mask with red and blue stripes over the whole face from the right-hand upper side to the left-hand lower side, and carries a staff with red and blue spiral lines), appear in the dances. Prominent masks are also Xē'mtsioa and his brothers and his sisters; Masmasalā'nix and his fellows, the raven and the nusxē'mta, and many others.[1]

THE TSIMSHIAN, NĪSQA', HAIDA, AND TLINGIT.

The tribes of this group learned the ceremonial avowedly from the Hē'iltsuq. Although I have not witnessed any part of their ceremonials, the descriptions which I received bring out with sufficient clearness its similarities to the winter ceremonial of the Kwakiutl. The ceremonials seem to be almost identical among all these tribes. It is most complete among the southwestern Tsimshian tribes, particularly the G-itxā'LA, but has been adopted by all the tribes of the coast. It is said that it reached the Haida not more than a hundred years ago.

I will tell here what I learned from the Nisqa'. They have six societies, which rank in the following order: The sEmhalai't, mēiLa', LōLE'm, ōlala', nanēstā't, hōnana'L, the last being the highest. The sEmhalai't is really not confined to the winter ceremonial, but is obtained when a person acquires the first guardian spirit of his clan and performs the ceremony belonging to this event. The tradition of the origin of these ceremonies localizes the events at Bellabella, and it

556 performance of rites of this kind. But sociological and ethical [182] concepts, shown at their highest development in the potlatch, are not limited to a few weeks of the year, or to any class of the community. Generosity on a large scale can be publicly
[577] displayed by chiefs alone, but to a lesser degree this virtue must be practised by everyone, since avarice is considered a
576 major sin. Anyone who happens to pass a house in which a 574 meal is taking place must be invited to share it; to do otherwise would be considered rude. The person summoned must take at least a trifle to show that he is not churlish and too proud to eat with his host, while if he is hungry, he shares [177] whatever is being served as a matter of course. The head of [273] the family should be the first to taste any wine[14] as proof that it is not poisoned, but otherwise he fares little, if any, better
[342] than his guests. This custom is now rapidly falling into disuse
[414] through the construction of individual family houses with doors and locks. The fisherman who has exclusive rights to a suit-
476 able place for netting olachen or salmon must give some of his [226] catch to anyone who asks him. If he has landed four salmon, the first solicitor is given one, later comers, none at all. When a net is set in the river, anyone passing is allowed to raise it and take some of the contents; if there are two fish, he may [685] remove one, if many, three or four. To take all would be a [626] despicable theft, sufficient to brand the transgressor as greedy; hence public opinion prevents the system from being carried [224] to excess. A hunter who brings back several mountain goats or other large game is expected to invite his neighbours to a feast, which virtually means that he must share his takings.

556 Presents of this kind increase the prestige of the donor who 431 has thus acted in accordance with Bella Coola ethics, and are advantageous investments since others must reciprocate. The system is carried to such lengths that, until recent years, it was more profitable to give away goods than to sell them. In the case of a sale, the purchaser endeavours to give as little as possible, whereas the recipient of a gift returns as much as

423 sumed that ten is the largest number of traps possible at that 614 weir. Those who have the right to that weir are the members of the ancestral family with the names of those first users. At [773] this point the logic of the Bella Coola fails to uphold the mytho-[226] logical pattern. No salmon-weir has remained in existence since the beginning of time; when one broke, owners were sometimes infants, and those who repaired the break became regarded as the rightful possessors. The system of ownership prevailing at the time of abandoning the weirs, was that indi- [428] viduals, not groups, had rights to certain sections of the weir which were willable like other personal property. In most [431] cases this right was transmitted with a name, marking the section of weir, which had to be duly validated by presents.
[428] In other cases, the intangible ownership was willed without any mark whatever.[8] Unless bequeathed in this way, disputes were frequent. Rights of this kind were never sold although [427] an owner often leased his section for a night, or longer period, receiving goods in return, and not forfeiting his ownership [431] thereby. This was particularly common when the renter was planning to give a potlatch. No case was heard of in which the right to a certain section of salmon-weir was given to a non-member of the ancestral family. Theoretically, this was possible, but practically it would be so inconvenient that it is most unlikely ever to have occurred, since the Bella Coola is [671] never such a slave to legal privileges that he fails to be guided by common sense.

226 Although individual ownership is thus recognized with [423] regard to sections of salmon-weirs and suitable places for olachen-nets, the owner is bound to share his haul. When he [577] catches a large number of fish, anyone, whether related to him [626] or not, can demand some. He cannot refuse, since to do so would brand him as selfish. The effective check on this system

[128] [8]Great difficulty was experienced in learning about the distribution of rights to sections of salmon-weirs. The evidence is conflicting, and though every effort was made to verify and check the above, there may be further regulations which were not learnt.

556 performance of rites of this kind. But sociological and ethical [182] concepts, shown at their highest development in the potlatch, are not limited to a few weeks of the year, or to any class of the community. Generosity on a large scale can be publicly
[577] displayed by chiefs alone, but to a lesser degree this virtue must be practised by everyone, since avarice is considered a 576 major sin. Anyone who happens to pass a house in which a meal is taking place must be invited to share it; to do other-
574 wise would be considered rude. The person summoned must take at least a trifle to show that he is not churlish and too proud to eat with his host, while if he is hungry, he shares whatever is being served as a matter of course. The head of
[177] the family should be the first to taste any wine[14] as proof that [273] it is not poisoned, but otherwise he fares little, if any, better than his guests. This custom is now rapidly falling into disuse
[342] through the construction of individual family houses with doors
[414] and locks. The fisherman who has exclusive rights to a suit-
476 able place for netting olachen or salmon must give some of his catch to anyone who asks him. If he has landed four salmon,
[226] the first solicitor is given one, later comers, none at all. When a net is set in the river, anyone passing is allowed to raise it and take some of the contents; if there are two fish, he may remove one, if many, three or four. To take all would be a
[685] despicable theft, sufficient to brand the transgressor as greedy;
[626] hence public opinion prevents the system from being carried to excess. A hunter who brings back several mountain goats
[224] or other large game is expected to invite his neighbours to a feast, which virtually means that he must share his takings.

556 Presents of this kind increase the prestige of the donor who has thus acted in accordance with Bella Coola ethics, and are 431 advantageous investments since others must reciprocate. The system is carried to such lengths that, until recent years, it was more profitable to give away goods than to sell them. In the case of a sale, the purchaser endeavours to give as little as possible, whereas the recipient of a gift returns as much as provided with means of sustenance, a house, and certain supernatural powers. The right to the names of these people, as well as to the type of ceremonial objects used by them, has been the privilege of their descendants. But these early Bella Coola, like their modern descendants, had several designations, each carrying with it a definite prerogative. In a single myth there may be embodied a dozen or more names and incidents which are quoted at the present day to authorize such different phases of culture as dances, rights to hunting-grounds, professions, names of dogs, or kusiut prerogatives.[9] Any myth which gives the initial use of a name, a dance, or any other prerogative, is termed a smaiusta. Each of these is, or was in the old days, remembered with great care and never recounted in full detail except to the members of the ancestral family whose names are embodied in it. Even at potlatches the full details of the myth are not laid bare. Indeed, if a young man is of a flighty, garrulous disposition, unlikely to preserve the dignity of his ancestral fame, the details are concealed from him. Even at the present time there is much resentment at any unauthorized use of a smaiusta, and in the old days this would inevitably have led to bloodshed.

Boas (p. 116) states that the terms smaiusta and sumsma are synonymous. The writer feels certain that this is an error. It was discussed repeatedly with various Bella Coola, all of whom agreed that a sumsma is a mere story which can be told by anyone, whereas a smaiusta is a myth possessed by the individual, or individuals, whose prerogatives are derived from it. To the Bella Coola the two are utterly different.

None the less, there is no doubt that records of the past change from one category to the other. A wealthy chief, eager to give a potlatch, but lacking the mythical authorization, must frequently have used a sumsma, claiming the hero as an ancestor. There would be veiled amusement at him for doing so, but the prestige of one who can give potlatches is so great that in time his claim would probably be accepted. The two [9] The details of these will be described later.

198 773 versions of the myth given (vol. I, pp. 313-19) is a case in point. The first was told as a smaiuste by a woman who claimed to be a descendant of the people figuring in it; the second, as a story, tomma, by a man. In view of the reliability of both informants, it seems highly probable that this is a story, partly converted to a myth. In other examples there are incidents resembling the supernatural tales given in vol. I, chap. IX, and here too it appears probable that tomma have been assimilated into smaiuste. It is complimentary to the truthfulness [577] of the Bella Coola, and to the respect they show for intangible [424] property, that none of the myths recorded were smaiuste owned by others. Repeatedly an informant would say that he knew one, but would not tell it since it belonged to some other family.

128 773 After collecting a few myths, in each of which it was stated that the first settlers at village X were A, B, and C, with their sisters, P and Q, it seemed as if it would have been possible, before the culture of the Bella Coola had fallen into its present decay, to make a census of those whom they believe to have been first settlers of this earth, and that such a list would have had few contradictions. This was soon found to be false. Two myths may give different people as the first occupants of a certain village, nor does such contradiction trouble the Bella Coola. Each man, convinced of the authenticity of his own family account, is quite willing to believe that the one belonging [811] to someone else is equally correct. This characteristic lack of logical consistency has already been mentioned in other connections. Boas (p. 61) likewise gives an instance of uncertainty as to the first occupants of a village, though, on the whole, he found Bella Coola mythology to be more codified than the present writer has done. In view of their lack of systematization in other matters, it would have been surprising if they had evolved a census of their first ancestors, accepted by all as accurate.

Another matter to be considered at this point is the simi- [178] larity of detail in many myths. In part this can be explained cases though an infant in arms, though uninitiated, can be brought to dances by its mother; distinctions between rich and poor, slave and freeman, become of slight importance; all that really matters is whether a person is or is not a kwiut. Membership in the society seems to the uninitiated the most desirable thing in life, although their fears are always so strong that they never cease to dread actual admission. The feeling of class consciousness which exists in a somewhat mild form at other seasons of the year, gives place to a powerful sentiment of superiority on the part of members of the society over those who are not so fortunate. Even the respect normally shown to chiefs is submerged since they, too, are subject to the rule of the marshals.

575 * 796 * 182 571 [781]

Apart entirely from this attitude of superiority and inferiority, is the bond of fellowship engendered among members of the society by the rites. Whatever happens, the uninitiated must be deceived. Moreover, the psychological effect of gathering nightly in a body for a specific purpose is tremendous. Night after night they eat together; night after night they listen to the words of the marshals, who impress on them the need for co-operation and secrecy, who hold before them the good example set by their fellows who have carried out rites successfully, who emphasize the fact that they are doing as their fathers did. The ceremonial import is of greatest consequence at all these gatherings, but when the uninitiated have withdrawn the kwiut relax somewhat and enjoy themselves. The food itself is always of the best and some of the usual restrictions are removed. It is, for example, the only time that women are allowed to eat the flesh of seals. If this delicacy is provided the marshals enjoy the tidbits, but after Cannibals, novices, and others have received preferential treatment, the remainder is distributed to all and sundry.

[262] [562] [264]

It has been stated by some writers, especially those unfamiliar with the significance of native ceremonial life, that the dances of the coastal tribes are orgies of immorality. This point was investigated with care and it may be stated posi-

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

*575 tively that such is not the case among the Bella Coola. At *796 the present time both drunkenness and vice are rampant, but ●577 neither of these practices is apparent on the nights when dances
273 are taking place. The writer was present at many kusiut dances, in each case attended by practically every resident, [834] and during them he saw only two drunken men. With regard to these, the sentiment of the influential members of the society was one of regret that the marshals could no longer exercise their prerogatives and punish the offenders. As several Bella Coola expressed it:

"Our dances are sacred and ceremonial, a drunken man spoils them."

As a rule they do not regard drunkenness as a serious vice, if a vice at all, hence this attitude was illuminating. It is more
*575 difficult to speak with certainty about morality; no breaches *796 of it could have occurred at the ceremonies witnessed, nor was 577 there any evidence that the excitement led to any licentious
834 actions. On the whole, the dances are desirable since they provide a source of tremendous interest and importance. Vice flourishes with lassitude and boredom; anything that stimulates the people reduces it, and when the Bella Coola are engaged in ceremonial rites, the sentiment of the seniors of the community is strongly opposed to anything that interferes with the solemnity of the occasion.

There is no reason to suppose that these factors were not present in former times, more potent than now when belief in the supernatural powers of the kukusiut has passed away. The whole question of sexual morality at kusiut dances was investigated with considerable care.

One point emphasized by all Bella Coola was that no kusiut was allowed to have relations with an uninitiated person, whether his wife or not, during the period that his face was blackened and he was wearing a ceremonial collar. The reason for this prohibition seems to have been one not of morality, but of the necessity for preserving the dignity and secrecy of [688] the kusiut society. An offender was punished by being struck

2:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

by a marshal with a billet of firewood; such a blow was never repeated and might or might not cause death. The woman with whom the member had misdemeaned himself was either initiated at once or killed if her relatives could not provide a name and prerogative. 575* 796* 577● 834

Restrictions between members of the society were less severe. Particularly during the long nights of lnxtāmem and nusiutālsap, when only kukusiut were present and when men and women, often scantily clad, were closely associated, there seems to have been a certain amount of immorality. It was by no means a time of licence, nor was laxity encouraged by the marshals; intercourse between members of the society did not conflict with kusiut regulations, and was accordingly a matter that concerned the individuals alone. [688]

Relations between the actual dancers and members of the other sex were formerly governed by strict rules, rigidly enforced by the marshals. After the coming of a call, a man could hold intercourse with a kusiut, provided that he did so in his own home, but in no other. But after nebusam, when he left his house, continence was demanded until the end of the season and the burning of the enclosure-platform. The only exception to this rule was that if a second dancer received a call in the same house, the restrictions placed on the first were raised while the call was actually upon the second; that is, between lnxtāmem and nebusam. After that both were subject to strict continence, unless a third call came to the same dwelling. The Bella Coola of today offer no explanation for this law, save that disregard of it was displeasing to the supernatural beings. An offender in this case was likewise punished by being struck once by a marshal. [688]

The religious aspects of the dances, as exemplified by the attitude of the Bella Coola to the masked figures and other phenomena, was described in the early part of this chapter, but additional observations may now be made. The writer realizes that the reader must find it difficult to understand how the uninitiated can be deluded into thinking that masked 575* 796* 781

NIE6 Bellacoola NE6

times, older relatives were revered, not only as senior members 177
of the ancestral family, but as those most familiar with myths 626
and other cherished possessions. With the spread of new ideas, 182
the young people no longer respect the loree of their elders, and 561 consequently do not heed their admonitionns and advice. Theoretically, such self-reliance would seem dessirable, but in practice it has led to unfortunate results. A ycoung man, considering himself superior to the older people, gloories in acting on his own initiative, but too often he lacks the rrequisite strength of character to guide his own life. If he wishhes to drink, he does so; if he desires to marry, he chooses hiss mate without con- [581] sidering the transmission of ancestral rights which stabilized unions in former times; if he tires of his wiife, he deserts her for another; if he cheats or steals, he is no ldonger restrained by relatives who fear disgrace. The elders, inccapable of stemming the tide, watch sadly and ask seriously whhether the coming of the white man has brought compensationn for the loss it has caused. It is deplorable that the emancipaation of the younger men and women has taken place before the development of the sense of individual responsibility anod conscience which public opinion formerly rendered less neceessary. Christianity provides a moral code for those who are fully converted, but for the many in the transition stage, the brreak-down of the old system of family influence has been tragic.

Profound religious beliefs and lack of iindividual initiative 181 are shared by all Bella Coola with the exceeption, perhaps, of a 177 few of the younger people who, having beeen educated at white man's schools, have adopted the new outlcook unconditionally. In most characteristics they display as widde variability as any 577 other people. In truthfulness, for exampple, they range from one extreme to the other. As the writer bbecame familiar with 124 the older men, he found it possible to reccognize without difficulty the strength of some and the weakneess of others. There are liars, but they can be easily detected oowing to their lack of finesse. It is a pleasure to record the reliabbility of the author's friends and informants. Their veracity was checked repeat-

577 edly until complete confidence was established, simplifying
[124] work in the field to an enormous extent. Equal trust could be placed on these men in other respects; articles of value were repeatedly left in their houses with the absolute certainty that they would be guarded with care. Some few individuals there were, however, who were neither honest nor trustworthy.
[771] Bella Coola religion is not concerned with ethics, but public 626 opinion demands honour in dealing with relatives or friends.
577 In former times, for example, debts incurred by an individual were considered a liability by his relations. If a man died after [426] buying goods on credit for a potlatch, his family were disgraced
[602] if they failed to pay his bills; now, unfortunately, nothing con-[177] strains the younger people, many of whom try to avoid settling even their own debts, much less those of dead relatives. Individual conscience has not replaced the tribal and, more specifically, family influence. Dishonesty in small matters is not [648] uncommon, particularly in dealing with white people who,
[177] according to the Bella Coola, were the first to transgress. The older people bitterly lament the lack of morality of the younger and state, probably with entire justification, that they would have been prevented by the open life which prevailed when several families shared a single house. On the whole, however, the average Bella Coola is probably no less honest than the average white man.

153 Individuals vary enormously in mental ability. In making 124 this investigation, it was necessary to interview all the older people of the tribe. Disregarding those unwilling to provide information, it was found that some absolutely lacked the ability to explain matters with which they were familiar; some did not have sufficient patience to be good teachers; some were so forgetful that they would omit necessary points in a story or account; some were downright stupid, whereas others displayed mental ability of no mean order. In reading ethnological literature, one is apt to think of the troubles experienced by the author, and to overlook the fact that natives have as

515 sionally, in a half-hearted manner, but it is not unusual for a man to allow the basin of water in which he makes his ablutions to remain standing for two or three weeks. Not many [177] years ago the Carriers taught their neighbours to make a kind [296] of soap from the ashes of burnt cottonwood sticks thrown into [388] water; with this clothes are washed irregularly and in most cases from sheer necessity only. In former times bathing was [783] a semi-sacred rite, but this fell into disuse with the passing of [177] the old religion, and the use of soap and water merely for the [291] sake of cleanliness has not become a daily habit. The women have more vanity; the younger girls especially like to have new clothes, though they wear them carelessly, heedless of fit. [196] An effort is often made to clean up for ceremonial dances, but it entails little more than the removal of the more obvious dirt and the putting on, over unchanged undergarments, of a sweater. Pride in personal appearance, love of tidiness, delight in a clean house, are all quite foreign to the Bella Coola.

356 Probably the reason for lack of comforts in the houses is simply that the people do not feel the need for them. They [264] consider it no hardship to sit on a rickety chair, scoop up food [231] from a common dish and, if they think of it, throw morsels [152] down to the dog or the cat. The smell, the flies, the dirt, the chaos do not concern them. Capable of undergoing privations, hardships, and even sufferings, they think neither of the com-231 fort of themselves nor of others. Their domestic animals are often treated abominably, not through lack of affection or cruelty, but from callousness. More than once the writer has seen a favourite dog steal a piece of food from the table. Its master, after a furious blow or kick at it, would suddenly, as if by inspiration, throw a choice bit to the animal, saying:

"Why, he must have been hungry!"

Though the Bella Coola feel a kinship with animals unknown to the white man, it is not combined with any recognition of their feelings as living creatures. There are, of course, [577] many exceptions, but on the whole public opinion demands generosity and kindness only towards human members of the group. The moral code is not concerned with animals.

619 others. This differentiated them clearly from all neighbouring [197] tribes.

B. Ceremonial. A member of a secret society in any of 575 the above towns was accepted as a member in any other one.
[609] A person of another tribe, even if known to belong to a comparable society, was treated as an uninitiated person.

C. Origin and Religion. The people of Bella Coola, Tal·io, and Kimsquit felt themselves to be akin through acceptance of the fact that their ancestors had been created together in the beginning of time. This marked them off with [771] great clearness from all other tribes, especially from the Carriers of the interior. This belief formed a sentimental and religious bond of great strength.

Neighbouring Tribes

648 It is desirable to describe, briefly, the tribes with which the Bella Coola came in contact.

THE CARRIERS

East of Bella Coola, amid the mountains of the interior, roved the Carriers. In summer they often came down to the river valley to fish or trade for salmon, and in winter they were sometimes forced by cold and starvation again to visit the Bella Coola, Bella Bella, or Rivers Inlet people. There was a [563] good deal of intermarriage between them and the inhabitants of the upper valley, so that the wanderers were able to spend the cold months with relatives. None the less, the Bella Coola
[186] considered these people utterly foreign in habits and beliefs,
[578] and to call a man a "Carrier" was, and still is, a deadly insult. The Carriers lacked the rich ceremonial life of the coastal peoples who, therefore, regarded them with scorn and con-
[796] tempt. The presence of a few of the much-despised Carriers was, however, almost necessary to the correct performance of the winter dances since they were uninitiated spectators whom it was necessary to impress and delude.

from the moon and stated that there were mountains and snow on it. It is commonly stated that the marks on the moon represent a man carrying a bucket. .821 [.756]

The stars figure but slightly either in Bella Coola mythology or thought; it is not even known who made them. Two in the Great Bear constellation are called respectively Tpiksta and X̱inx̱ines, "Little Girls." A lone star in the same part of the sky, named A'lox, is said to be following the girls to the forest for illicit intercourse. [.773]

Moon, stars, and above all the sun, were, and still are to a certain extent, used by the Bella Coola in computing the passage of time. There are no individuals with the definite prerogative of keeping count of time, but formerly wise old men used to do so.[4] Differences of opinion were the rule rather than the exception, a condition which often led to bitter disputes concerning the proper date for starting the winter ceremonials. Boas (p. 41) has recorded the Bella Coola calendar in greater detail than the present writer has been able to do. The making of calendrical observations is a lost art, and the following list of the months was all that could be learnt. It will be noted that these agree with Boas in regard to the months in the early part of the year, but not in those between the summer and winter solstices; no explanation is offered for this disparity. .805 .821 [.554] .578 [.796] [.114 .178] [.114]

The ancestral family consists of those whose ancestral names, embodying definite prerogatives, are embodied in a single origin myth. 614 424

A stranger finds it easier to understand why names are so carefully maintained within the ancestral family by thinking of them as symbols of prerogatives, but it must be emphasized that the Bella Coola preserve with equal jealousy those designations of which the only prerogative is the marking of this actual membership. 551 [554]

If, then, the ancestral family be regarded as a group possessing a large number of name-prerogatives, it may well be asked how these are distributed among the members. The first point to be emphasized is that the ancestral family is a unit held together without definite social mechanism. There is no accepted "head" of the family, nor are there any clearly formulated laws governing the transmission of the name-prerogatives. Before death a man usually calls together his relatives and bequeaths,[8] according to his desire, his personal property in slaves and canoes, and his intangible property in names. Such a designation does not become the property of the new owner unless he is able to validate his ownership by a distribution of presents; meanwhile the name is "dead." If, during this period, some other member of the ancestral family should desire it for a child, or for himself, he can take possession of it by the customary distribution of presents. In doing so he would anger the legatee, but the latter cannot himself use the appellation since it is already in use. Even at the present time there are bitter quarrels over the assumption of names, and such have certainly occurred for many generations. If a man can validate fairly promptly a name willed to him, it is most unusual for anyone else to try to forestall him. 614 553 428 553 431 [578]

If a man dies intestate, his sons consider themselves his normal heirs, and the most respected of them validates for himself as many names as he desires or is able to assume. Disputes are not as common as might be expected since the 428 553 [578]

[8]In case of sudden death or failure to make a will confusion sometimes occurs.

428 influence of a chief is usually sufficient to settle claims as to 553 which of his brothers shall receive which name. Even if none of them is a chief, some one of them is certain to have greater [578] influence than the others. If a dead man has no sons, his daughters can assume his names, which they may transmit to their children. Failing both sons and daughters, a man's brothers and sisters are his heirs, as usual, the one of influence being the one who really arranges matters.[6] None the less, it [614] must be emphasized that if the members of the immediate family are slow to validate a dead man's names, they may be taken by any member of the ancestral family.

463 In former days it was customary to create a "remembrancer" to preserve the ancestral myth. The older and more 869 influential members of the ancestral family would choose an [614] intelligent young relative to whom to relate the myth in great detail. One informant described how her mother, the last official "remembrancer," had been instructed by her grandfather.
The old man had been accustomed to take his granddaughter, a girl about twelve years of age, to bed with him, and whisper to her the myth, with his hand pressed over her anus to prevent escape of his words. At the conclusion of the recitation [789] he always spat in her ears to make the words stick. The members of the ancestral family, recognizing that the "remembrancer" was the person best acquainted with the myth, were wont to consult him or her about it, and, of course, about the [553] names embodied in it. A "remembrancer" had no authority to decree who should receive names, but appeals were often made to him, and a tactful individual was frequently able to settle disputes.

578 Considering the extreme fluidity of the whole system it is 428 surprising that quarrels are not more common. These are 614 limited by the system of wills, through which a man bequeaths his most valuable personal property, especially his intangible 553 property in kusiut name-prerogatives (II, p. 2). Ancestral

[6] At the present time the same principle governs the disposal of houses and gardens on the reserve.

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

names are also willed, but since their value depends on the 578
goods expended to validate them, there is seldom bitterness 614 about their allotment. Indeed, a chief who is the legal owner 553 of a designation which came from above in the beginning of time, will in many cases choose to elevate his position with [428] respect to a title of comparatively recent date. But if any person who is not a member of the ancestral family should [685]
dare to use an ancestral name, all the members rise to avenge
the theft, for such they feel it to be. In recent years, however, [178]
this practice has become comparatively common. In such cases a man, eager to share in the glories of a myth and able to give a potlatch, has validated an ancestral name to which he has no right. The presence of the white man alone
restrains the injured ancestral family. Names are sometimes [426] lent or hired to those who are not members of the group for definite sums; the recipient recompenses the individual. If [427]
such names are not returned for several generations quarrels
are apt to arise since the recipient claims to be the real owner and not the temporary possessor. During his tenancy of the name he is entitled to any prerogative attached to it, but he is not considered a bona fide member of the ancestral family.

Instances have occurred in which an old man or woman, [428]
believing himself to be the last survivor of an ancestral family, has donated his names and myth to those who have befriended him, or these have been taken by those who buried him. Some [557] individuals are constantly watching to conduct the funerals of friendless old people in the hope of so obtaining names. But in almost every case this leads to friction, since it is virtually impossible for an ancestral family to die out. Perhaps in the next generation, perhaps in the following one, some youth will claim descent from the first ancestors of the supposedly defunct family, and claim the myth and names embodied therein. This [628] leads to a feud with the person, or his descendants, who has received the names through aid given to the "last" of the family.

Such instances of an ancestral family becoming practically 614

establish himself with the traditions of his new home. This is another illustration of the patrilineal tendency of the whole organization. 621 [614] [553]

Politically, the village is the most important Bella Coola unit. Usually, though not always related to one another, the inhabitants are always friends. If an attack is made on a village by a hostile war-party, all the inhabitants suffer equally. On the other hand, if the residents decide to attack another settlement, there is no compulsion for anyone to share the burden. Each individual, with the exception of slaves, follows his own inclination. In the case of murder or other wrong inflicted by an individual, the responsibility rests on his immediate family, not the village. Factions within the village seem to have been unimportant; individual jealousies were common, and often led to murder, but if a family became unpopular or considered itself aggrieved, it usually moved to another village. Neighbouring settlements were generally on friendly terms and often assisted each other in war, but this was not compulsory. Indeed, cases are known in which a war-party from the outer coast, about to attack Sinxl, passed within a quarter of a mile of Q̓omqo·ts without its inhabitants even warning their threatened neighbours. [628] [682] [578] [627] [628]

As far as internal organization is concerned, the village is as fluid a unit as are most Bella Coola groupings. If one individual has attained a position of eminence through the potlatch system (vol. I, chap. IV), he is "chief" of the village, and his advice is generally followed. If several men have approximately the same importance, there is no dominating figure. In any case, a chief lacks executive authority, and such obedience as he receives is due to his personal influence. Some slight deference is paid to the man who uses the name of the eldest of the first group of settlers, the first chief, but this is not sufficient to warrant the title of "chief" with the significance usually attached to the term. The important members of the village are accustomed to meet for the discussion of ceremonial mat- 622 554 [556] 621 623 535 796

to arrange his marriage with some female slave; once this had taken place, the actual treatment meted out to him differed only slightly from that shown to a member of the family. In former times it would probably have been difficult for a stranger to tell married slaves from the members of the Bella Coola community until he had been long enough in the country to understand more than appeared on the surface. 567 582

Marriages between Bella Coola men and slave women were not infrequent, while like partnerships between slave men and even the daughters of chiefs were not unknown. In such cases the status of the children depended on the performance of ceremonies to wash from them the stain of their slave blood. While the mother was still pregnant her husband would call guests, not only from his own village, but from foreign tribes as well. Presents were given, according to the wealth of the donor, often aided by his immediate family, to "wash the child." Such ceremonies would be repeated several times before birth, and again at that time. Bella Coola sentiment was that such presents gagged the recipients; they knew of the dishonourable ancestry of the child, but the receipt of gifts on his account had wiped away the disgrace. Such a child was able to inherit prerogatives from his mother's old home, duly validated in Bella Coola by valuables, and by his own lavish presents he could silence those who remembered the blot on his ancestry. Similar procedure was carried out if a free woman married a slave. Unless her husband were already owned by one of her family, the woman's father or brother would arrange to purchase him. Then, aided by him, they would give the same type of presents to clear the children from the taint of slavery. If this were not done, the children had only the status of slaves, though, born and brought up in Bella Coola and associating from infancy with their master's children, they were virtually considered members of the family. 431 567 [428]

"Washing the child," during pregnancy and at birth, sufficed to cover the taint on its history, but in later years if such a person failed to continue to give ceremonies, people would again talk of his short-comings. So, too, for the child or grand- [557] [578]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948

431 child of a mixed Bella Coola and slave marriage. As long as 567 such an one maintained a position of importance in the com-
578 munity by the distribution of presents, nothing was said, but [554] if he should fail to do so, he could be, and frequently was, insulted by having references made to his ancestry. In case of dispute or rivalry it was always a temptation to refer to such a blot, but if he had atoned for it with presents, references were considered improper. Unquestionably, memory of slave
554 ancestry was forgotten in course of time if the line was influ-
567 ential, although recollections of the stigma were always carried for at least two or three generations. At the present time the most influential woman in Bella Coola, the one who has given most presents, is the granddaughter of a Smith Inlet slave. This man had lived in Bella Coola for many years and had married another slave, by whom he had a son. The latter became the husband of an influential Stuix woman. When she became pregnant, her family secured the liberation of her husband, and gave many presents to "wash the child." One daughter was born to this couple, the woman just mentioned. Her mother's relatives were influential, and her father was [555] such an expert canoe-maker that he was able to win an honourable position for his daughter by presents of his handicraft. The woman, possessed of considerable ability herself, has been able to give many ceremonies and so reach a position of eminence. No one dares insult her by mentioning her ancestry, but everyone knows about it and if her children should fail to hold their position, they would be open to insult on this score. The woman has validated names and myths derived both from her mother and father, without explaining how the Smith Inlet traditions came to Bella Coola.

To sum up, it may be said that the position of slaves in Bella Coola was not particularly onerous, though it depended entirely on the will of their masters. Without status in the [182] community, a slave could have been abused by a cruel owner, though the public life of the village, where all lived and ate together, tended to break down the unsystematically enforced differences of rank.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

time, he fails in any way to reciprocate the hospitality, he loses his place among his special associates. So, likewise, the Bella Coola who receives present after present, but fails to give any in return gradually receives smaller and smaller gifts and in time loses his social position and influence entirely. As with ourselves, too, there is a disguised feeling of contempt for the parvenu, the man who, lacking the traditional dignity attached to one of the names which came from above at the beginning of time, has elevated the fame of a more recent name by ostentatious giving. But in Bella Coola, as with ourselves, success is the great criterion, and the donor finds his influence little impaired by the lack of one of the ancient origin myths. It is dangerous to cite similarities between the social practices of divergent peoples, and this one must not be stretched too far. The pride of a man in being able to incorporate himself in the traditions of his ancestors is lacking with the host at a dinner party, nor does the latter, to any extent, attain the status of chief through his hospitality. Further, a Bella Coola will sometimes endeavour to shame the poverty of a guest by giving him a large present. Unless the recipient is willing to admit his inferiority he must repay this with a still larger gift. The original donor will then vindicate himself by increasing the value of his next gift until a fierce competition ensues. This feature of rivalry in generosity is rare in Bella Coola, and never reached the same proportions that it did among the Kwakiutl.

171
558

The following is a good instance of the manner in which a haughty man regards the acceptance of gifts. A Rivers Inlet man married a Calvert Island woman who went to live with her husband. The man's mother, to show her amiable feelings towards the marriage, frequently gave thick slices of boned spring salmon, a great delicacy, to the family of her daughter-in-law. The Calvert Island chief considered these presents an insult to him, as if the Rivers Inlet people thought that he and his people were so poverty-stricken they lived on skin and bones. To avenge this slight he made war on the Rivers Inlet Indians and slew many of them. This attitude of the Calvert

*556 Island chief was felt by the Bella Coola to be quite natural;
● 578 one of their own chiefs might have resented the insult in the same manner. This account may have no historical basis, but it is a clear example of Bella Coola sentiment.

*556 Further examples may help to clarify this point. A few 648 years ago a number of Kwakiutl Indians visited Bella Coola
558 to perform a mourning ceremony in honour of a deceased Bella
[765] Coola who had a Kwakiutl name from his grandfather, a member of that tribe. All the natives were invited to a large house, where the visitors gave a dance according to their own ancestral myths; the songs which were used recounted the history of the Kwakiutl name of the dead man. After thus displaying their prerogatives, they felt themselves obliged, and proud, as hosts, to give presents as validation. The sum of $546 was distributed among the guests. Realizing that it would be impossible to return such a sum by holding ceremonials in Fort Rupert, the home of the Kwakiutl, the leading Bella Coola decided to return the compliment immediately. The amount to be given was discussed at great length. Appreciating the courtesy of the foreigners in thus coming to pay honour to the deceased, it was not wished to insult them by giving a larger present, which would have had the effect of intimating that the recipients considered the $546 a trifling amount. Accordingly it was finally agreed to give the visitors about $300, which was done as validation of a Bella Coola ceremony at which the strangers were present. Thus the hosts allowed themselves to be shamed as a mark of courtesy. Not to be outdone in politeness, the Kwakiutl chief made a speech, expressing his willingness to allow the Bella Coola to drive him (this occurred in the days of horses and carts) to the wharf to take the steamer. In other words, he allowed the Bella Coola to put him in their debt, as they had allowed him and his party to do with respect to the distribution of money. The visit terminated with friendly relations maintained on both sides.

123 The need of validating every ceremonial act by presents 533 can be further illustrated by the following instance. When

all that he sits in an enviable spot, irrespective of its location in the house. 554 556*

In precisely the same manner a man may take for himself a seat in the central part of the row behind the fire, but he is laughed at for endeavouring to assume a dignity, unworthily, unless he can validate his position by lavish presents. The Bella Coola are always ready to make fun of a person who fails to maintain his seat. On the death of the occupant of the central position it is taken for granted that whoever inherits his name will assume that location and give the essential presents, but it is not incumbent upon him to do so. He may choose to establish his new name at his old station, beside, instead of behind, the fire. Thus it has come to pass that the seat of the most important chief of a village is often at the side of the house. When all are seated the chiefs may be widely separated, and a parent may have obtained for his son a seat in a better part of the house than his own. But as a rule the chiefs sit in a row at the back of the fire, the most influential one in the middle. There must have been feuds when two men desired to seat themselves in the central position at the same time, but disputes about this were uncommon, because a man's seat was, and still is, primarily regarded as the intangible goods wherewith he is clothed, rather than his right to sit at any particular spot. It is these non-material coverings that enable a man to be bold and assertive in argument or suggestion, in fact to be a chief. A young man may have had conferred on him one of the noblest names, but his influence depends on the value of the goods expended on his behalf, subject of course to the universal characteristic that a man of forceful character may have more influence than his actual position warrants. [424] [428] [622] [424]

Jealous feuds are common when the man who owns the name of the first chief, first ancestor of a village, has duly validated it, but is being eclipsed in the giving of potlatches by a man whose name is of less intrinsic importance. Such a complication recently arose at Kimsquit, and the Bella Coola [578] [682]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

554 ascribe two murders which took place there in 1915 to jealousy
* 556 engendered by rivalry.

A chief who desires to have his son, or other near relative, [578] succeed to his actual seat may validate for him a position at [682] his feet. If several potlatches be given, with distribution of goods for this purpose, it becomes recognized that the son shall [622] take his father's seat. None the less, he will not have his father's influence or prestige unless he can himself continue to give away goods, because the power of a chief rests on this, not on his ancient name or the location of his seat.

553 Further evidence that a man's influence rests less on his
* 556 actual name than on the wealth distributed with reference to
it is found in the lack of uniformity in the type of names validated. Those of highest potential importance are the ones brought to the earth by the first-comers, yet in many cases a man prefers to elevate his position with respect to a name of later origin. It is not uncommon for a man to validate several ancestral designations, and choose one of them to be his most important by valuable gifts for the seat which he occupies with respect to it; or in other cases a name of modern origin is selected and elevated. Thus, a certain Bella Coola chief who is the legal owner of the names Q̓eil and Xemlaix, two of the first people to settle this earth, has based his greatness on the goods expended for a seat with reference to the name Siäkeläx, of more modern origin. It is accordingly clear that any Bella Coola can rise to a position of importance, even though he lacks the right to one of the most ancient names. Moreover, some chiefs prefer to validate several names rather than concentrate on one alone.

[622] Furthermore, a powerful chief can create a name. In this case the "power" of the designation rests, not in any supernatural origin, but in the actual wealth distributed. Two examples will serve to illustrate this point. Between 1880 and 1890 a chief was preparing to give a potlatch at which his nephew was to receive a name, when fire destroyed the village with the exception of his house. This added to the value of

ened by the age-long power of his ancestor. Finally, in old age a powerful chief is careless where he seats himself; his fame is so great that he can afford to disregard all conventions. 554 556 622 [183]

POWER OF CHIEFS

It will be seen from the foregoing that chieftainship among the Bella Coola does not depend on hereditary rank, still less on an elective principle, but on the individual's prestige as displayed, especially in his ability to acquire for himself a firm seat by the giving of presents. As he continues to do so his influence becomes ever greater. Consequently, it is impossible to state clearly what are the powers of a chief; such depend upon his prestige and influence. For a Bella Coola chief has no executive or judicial authority; what deference is shown to him depends on his success as a man, a factor which is constantly rising or falling.

The coming of the white man has enabled the Bella Coola to earn comparatively large sums of money by trapping and fishing. This in turn has enabled nearly everyone to give at least one potlatch, a very different state of affairs from that which prevailed in the last century when it required years of toil for a man to amass the necessary food and skins. Consequently, in many towns there were no men who had given potlatches, so that a man's prestige was estimated by the presents he had given at smaller ceremonies. Sometimes, moreover, a man preferred to increase his fame by giving rites of a different nature, such as kusiut dances, and the presents then distributed might elevate him in the eyes of the community, to a position above that of a man who had given a potlatch. This, however, was unusual. [177] [434] [431] [535]

After a fourth potlatch a man is accorded a position of eminence, and is termed a namitl chief. Namitl is an untranslatable word, with the significance of "passage," an allusion to the amount of goods which have passed through his hands. Jealous and vulgar-minded persons pun on the word, applying [578]

1:56:Dewalth E-5 (1922-1924) 1948

554 it to the digestive tract. After a man has given four potlatches
556 he feels superior to those who have been unable to do likewise.
622 His name is "bright," "clean," "heavy," "firm," or "upright" in Bella Coola terms, and so, likewise, his seat. He feels independent and proud. Such a chief will fearlessly enter the back-[578] room where ceremonial rites are taking place, even if not invited to do so.

"He is so strong, he can go where he will," say the Bella Coola.

The advice of such a man is taken because of his ability and prestige, especially by the members of his own family. A few years ago, for example, when a certain Bella Coola died, his brother wished a haxiat name-prerogative of the deceased to pass to the dead man's daughter. The girl's mother's father, a nuxsit chief, objected, and his desires were followed, although the name in question was not connected in any way with his family. In small matters, too, people gladly carry out the wishes of a chief. Work around the house is done for him [592] without thought of disobedience. An old man was asked whether, when he was young, chiefs gave many orders and acted as masters in their households.

"You bet," the old man answered emphatically with a dry chuckle.

231 It is difficult now to form an accurate estimate, from observation, of the influence of chiefs solely through virtue of the 552 goods they have expended. But the following is a concrete 622 example. In November, 1913, the writer, while walking through the Bella Coola village, was bitten by a dog. He was told that the animal belonged to a certain old woman. When next he saw the owner he asked her whether she knew that her dog attacked passers-by.

"Yes," she answered, in a matter-of-fact tone, "He is a chief and can do what he likes."

Further questioning elicited the information that the old [766] woman and her husband, the children but survivors of an ancestral family, had transmitted some of their ancestral

622 there is such dread of the supernatural powers possessed by 628 members of the hamat society that none would dare go there.
998 If an uninitiated person should do so, he would formerly have been either killed or initiated into the society. The meeting-[575] place of the ilemqa-ic chiefs is on a ledge of rock jutting out over a waterfall about a quarter of a mile from the village.
The stream winds down a narrow cleft of the mountain side, screened by dense vegetation, and suddenly falls into a cauldron, so hemmed in by cliffs that no sunlight can enter. The ledge is immediately above the brink of the falls, one of the most awe-inspiring places imaginable. The meeting-places of other villages lack such natural settings, though all are at the bases of cliffs, or near some easily distinguished feature. Some 998 of them are decorated with rude carvings, pecked into the 582 stone. The meaning of the designs is not known to any of 998 the present inhabitants. Some of them were made, long ago, by chiefs when they were composing tunes; they picked out
the rock in time to the music forming in their minds. Others [211] were mere memorials of certain events. If a chief gave an important ceremony, he, or one of his friends, carved a figure, perhaps that of a man, perhaps of some animal connected with the rite, to recall the occasion. No carvings have been made within the life-time of any Bella Coola, so it is probable that they had further significance, now unknown.

622 When a chief wishes to summon his fellows for a meeting 623 he visits each and notifies him by a simple pressure of the foot, in many cases unobserved even by those sitting near. The 201 person so called slips away, unostentatiously, to the meeting-place.

571 The position of chief was not without disadvantages in the 622 old days. The Bella Coola are so jealous that anyone who 623 succeeded in elevating himself to a position above his fellows became an object of envy. Their mythology contains many [152] examples of the murder of some powerful chief by rivals of his own village, and informants of today state that these records are true. One intelligent man asserted that his father had thus been slain about seventy years earlier. It appears that attempts were commonly made to kill chiefs by means of sympathetic magic, and it is quite possible that such attempts, becoming known, preyed upon the minds of the victims to such an extent that death resulted. 578 622 682 [154]

WEALTH

Since wealth is so important in chieftainship, it would be desirable at this point to consider the concepts of wealth. Unfortunately, it is impossible to give a satisfactory treatment of this subject. The coming of the white man altered the economic aspects of Bella Coola life so radically, and at such an early period, that concrete examples of economic interdependence, so useful in a thorough study, could not be obtained in the field. It is possible that greater attention to this subject might have produced more satisfactory results, but I am doubtful of this. 114 177 556*

In the old days, "wealth" was of two categories: (a) Prerogatives, tangible or intangible, which could be shown, pictorially or dramatically, or could be expounded in words; and (b) Goods which could be distributed for validating such prerogatives. Individual possessions, unused for distribution, were hardly considered as wealth; a sewing-machine, a bottle of whiskey, a bed, or some other luxury might give satisfaction to the owner, but did not increase his importance in the eyes of his fellows. The value of objects was only for their use in ceremonial distribution; indeed, prior to such distribution, they were only of potential value. This attitude controlled Bella Coola economics in the early days of contact, and still influences their behaviour. A native store-keeper once ruefully commented on the fact that he would gain no advantage from the goods on his shelves, since he hoped merely to sell them, not to give them away. 556* [422] [177]

A man's relatives were expected to help him in the acquisition of goods, but the extent of their contributions was never 184 476 556*

ability are always seeking to lend goods to those who are planning potlatches or other rites, knowing that the investment is safe and lucrative. 556* [726]

X uses his own discretion as to how much wealth is necessary. He knows how much he owes for presents received on previous occasions, and would not dream of giving a potlatch until able to repay these. Failure to do so would hold him up to the derision of the whole countryside. But he acts upon his own judgment with regard to interest. If he continues to hoard goods until he is able to repay with great increase, he gains prestige from his generous returns, but meanwhile he does not enjoy the distinction which would have followed a smaller affair at an earlier period. Further, there is the uncertainty about how much his wife's family will contribute, though that can be estimated with a fair degree of accuracy; in Bella Coola every transaction is made publicly, so each man knows the wealth of his neighbour. The favourite month for a potlatch is October, before the kusiut dances, when there is abundance of food. At this season there is plenty of salmon roe, berries, and crabapples, all of which might be ruined by frost. Occasionally, a potlatch takes place after the kusiut period, but in that case the only foods available are olachen grease, smoked meat, smoked fish, dried hemlock-bark, and dried berries. If several men in one village decide to give potlatches in the same year there may be rivalry and dispute as to which shall be first. There is no satisfactory method of settling this point. [626] [796] [262] [578]

When all is ready X tells a herald (I, p. 244) to summon his fellow villagers to his house the following day for nlâxtem. It is customary for all to accept, but no social obligation is broken should a man or woman fail to do so. [203]

The next morning no one eats in his own house, knowing that free food will be distributed. While his expected guests are adorning themselves by washing and painting, X, aided by his family and others, prepares large quantities of food, borrows boxes, and makes other necessary arrangements. Pre- [802] [426]

Pre-
* 556 sently the guests assemble, those who are sisaok wearing on [575] their heads one or more weasel skins as a mark of membership
237 in the society. Each takes the seat to which he is entitled,
292 the chiefs behind the fire, or on either side of it, the commoners,
[554] slaves, and foreigners in the two corners nearest the door. The heralds move to and fro between door and fire, their constant exchange of remarks adding to the general interest of the affair. It is the function of a herald to lend dignity to chiefs by
[203] the tone of his observations, but should one fail to live up to his station, the herald is privileged to comment thereon. In some respects his position approximates that of a buffoon, but as a herald always receives valuable presents, the office is sometimes accepted by ambitious young men, willing to undertake the slightly derogatory duties in return for the substantial gain.

264 A number of young ladis, friends or relatives of X, distribute the food. It is placed in boxes; an important chief is not called
* 556 upon to share with any one, whereas six or seven men of no
[885] standing may partake from one box. These receptacles, with whatever food remains in them, are taken home by the guests; otherwise the host would be insulted. Many boxes are lost in
• [578] this way, a source of considerable irritation. After the first course, a second follows, consisting of a different kind of food in another box, and in some cases there is a third, and even a fourth course. A chief must never appear stingy. The more he gives, the more does his prestige increase. Also, a man who gives freely receives abundantly, so that generosity brings its reward.

583 Next, the father or other male relative of X's wife, or a
* 556 dumat friend who speaks for him, stands up and makes a speech, [537] extolling the fame of his own family by sketching in general
425 outlines one of the myths of his ancestors, and announcing that [424] X's wife is taking to her husband some portion of it. This may be the prerogative of using a spoon carved, for example, with [532] the shape of a beaver; or a carved box, or a totem-pole with certain figures on it, or the right to use a painting of a grizzly bear on the wall of his house, or an ancestral name.

of his village, hence they will not feel it incumbent upon them to intervene. But news travels, and in course of time the sisaok members of some other tribe will decide to send a raiding party against X's village. All informants agreed most emphatically that this custom prevailed among the coast people from the Tsimshian country to Alert Bay, but specific examples could not be obtained. The Bella Coola regard such a raid as the proper course to pursue, and belligerent tribes may have used an irregularity in the potlatch rites as an excuse for an assault. It is clear, however, that this custom never attained such prominence that it could be called a law. 556* 688 628

The following is an instance of the Bella Coola outlook on the question: 556* 688

The father of an informant had had such success in giving potlatches that his neighbours were jealous. On one occasion he prepared a representation of a whale, an elaborate wooden frame, fifteen feet long, operated by men concealed within and carrying passengers; this was a figure which entered into his ancestral myth. One of the carpenters who made it, bribed by a jealous rival of the donor of the potlatch, arranged that the lower jaw of the whale should fall to the floor during the proceedings. This revealed the mechanism of the structure. White influence on the coast prevented an incursion of foreign raiders, but according to this informant, the chiefs determined that his father should die, and they employed a sorcerer for this purpose. His father and eleven other relatives died soon afterwards. This man, the sole survivor, ascribes his escape to his adoption of Christianity. [578] [532] [578] [177] [754]

Another instance of the penalty which follows errors in potlatch ritual occurred a few years ago, when a number of young men used the cone-shaped whistles openly, as if they had been toys. The presence of the white man prevented any open steps towards punishment, but before long all the youths died. No one knows what caused their deaths, though probably they were due to an expert in black magic acting on the instructions of a senior sisaok. [534] [177] [754]

After the prayer, X and his family give more food to their guests, whose boxes containing what they are to carry away are increasing in number. By his lavishness, X increases his prestige in the eyes of his fellow-villagers. 556*

If he can afford to build a new house embodying the form [335]

553 without special places, X calls upon some eloquent friend to direct the distribution of the money. This speaker orates how
* 556 X is carrying out the rites incumbent on his noble and exalted 575 station, how all honour him for so doing, and how all should [537] strive to follow his example. He then says that to give strength to the name Qwaqwasila, for example, X will give away, say $100. He further announces who have contributed this amount: perhaps $50 from X, and the other half from various relatives of Y. If the sum in question be large it is always mentioned from whom, and how the donor has obtained the money. Thus every financial transaction becomes publicly known, and the more prominently a man figures, the greater is his prestige. Next, the amount to be used for the second initiate's name is announced, with the same details, and in like fashion the sums decided upon for each successive initiate.

Then the total amount is distributed among the guests by the heralds, under X's supervision. He usually gives every-[562] one the same amount; men sometimes receive more than women, but in every case members of the same sex receive an equal sum. The Bella Coola are not expert mathematicians, [803] so that faulty division is the rule. If X, for example, decides to give $1.50 to each person present, it is a time of considerable anxiety while the stack of bills is being reduced, to watch whether or not there will be the exact amount. If X finds out [426] he is short he will hastily borrow some money, as it would be an insult to omit anyone. If the amount be too great, he will [578] use the surplus in making presents to the more influential guests.

With the exception of this possible surplus, the money distributed is regarded as an outright present; "it has flowed away to make good the boys' names" is the Bella Coola expression. A chief will remember how much he has received, and if he wishes to uphold or to increase his own dignity, he will make a point of returning at least an equivalent to X on some future occasion. But though in effect he may make return, such is never said to be the case. "The money has flowed away."

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

* 556 The first course is dried cohoe salmon mixed with olachen 264 grease. The fish is first placed in boxes, approximately one to every four persons, though a chief may be honoured by an [262] individual box, and the grease poured over it. As always, any food not consumed is carried away. Failure to do so would ● [578] be an insult to X. Then round wooden dishes are distributed into which are poured the berries of Viburnum pauciflorum.
[262] The waiters pour olachen grease over these and the mixture is eaten with wooden spoons. These two foods are invariably the first meal of a potlatch.

* 556 If the siki of the last guests to arrive has not returned the power given him by the Bella Coola expert, he now stands up 575 and shakes his rattle as a signal that he desires to start his 535 dance. The Bella Coola siki also stands up, and the visiting siki contorts himself and finally pretends to produce something from his stomach, which he throws across to his colleague.
The latter feigns to catch it, cries hoip loudly several times,
and makes the motions of hurling what he has just received into the room at the back of the house where the initiates are concealed. Then he sits down. Meanwhile the last-to-arrive party of guests have started to beat out the tune of one of the ssaok[18] songs of their own siki who dances in time to it. Then another song is beaten out and another member of the party dances, and so on until all have danced who desire to do so.
Each wears his own head-dress and each performs in the manner already described. After the dancing, the members of this party of guests give presents to X and other Bella Coola chiefs. There is no fixed ratio between the value of the gifts
* 556 and the rank of the recipients, though chiefs receive more than [554] lesser men, and X most of all. These presents are spuxdjut, which may be translated as "eagle down-ness," merely a mark of friendship and goodwill. They are not returnable. Goods so received are distributed by X with his other possessions at [578] the potlatch, care being taken not to return them to the donors, which would be insulting.

[18] Xe-ne songs (I, p. 217) are sometimes used.

not returnable by X to his wife's family. A question on this point was regarded as highly amusing. If used for investment-gifts, the presents received in return are given to X, not to his wife's relations. 556* 583

A speaker, acting on instructions from the brother or other member of X's wife's family, also announces what names, portions of myth-prerogatives, or other privileges she is bestowing on her husband. After that the people disperse, although they are free to re-enter the house, where, during the afternoon, arrangements are being made for the elaborate ceremonial which takes place that night. 556*

Towards dusk the guests reassemble and take their places as before. Part of the goods which X proposes to give away has been brought in, and, aided by members of his family, he busies himself recounting and making final plans for its distribution. As the Bella Coola have no system of writing, accurate division of goods at a potlatch causes considerable difficulty and worry to the donor. A slighted guest will feel aggrieved, and the sacred nature of the rite will have been subjected to insult if arrangements are not satisfactory. The first business is the settlement of debts by X to the members of his own village. He may perhaps have borrowed fifty blankets ten years previously from a certain individual whom he now intends to repay, with foreign guests as witnesses to the transaction. X always endeavours to reimburse with as large a premium as possible, because by so doing he displays his nobility of mind to the assemblage; but if he can restore only the amount borrowed, or the same with a small increase, there will be no trouble such as might occur should he fail to return at least the principal. When the debt has been settled with interest the matter is at an end, for there is no compulsion upon the man who receives the additional sum to repay this with interest in his turn. The amount previously lent, and the occasion, are always publicly announced, so that all are made aware of his generosity with regard to interest. [212] [578] 426 556*

are strictly non-returnable, being regarded as "eagle down,"[a] and having, therefore, a ceremonial significance. They validiate and mark the importance of the representation just displayed. They are spoken of as having been shaken off by the deceased as he departed to return to his home above. [769] [431]

If there are many susaok initiates concealed within the back-room, some of them may now be called upon to dance, but usually this is reserved for the following night. Unless some of those secluded are going to dance, food is distributed and all disperse. [575] [535]

THE POTLATCH: THIRD DAY

This is the day when presents are given and, with the previous, is the most important of the whole ceremonial. The following are its features.

During the Day

(1) Distribution of much food, and sometimes of insults to the guests by excessive presents, or by the destruction of valuables. [578]

During the Evening and Night

(2) Dramatic representation of some object connected with X's ancestral myth.

(3) Distribution of presents by X to recompense the craftsmen who have assisted in the potlatch.

(4) Repayments by X of gifts received at previous potlatches.

(5) Giving of presents by X to some of his guests.

(6) Distribution of presents to strengthen X's seat.

(7) Distribution of presents to strengthen, or establiish, seats for a number of young men.

(8) Dancing of the susaok initiates. 556*

(9) Distribution of presents to recompense those who haave assisted the susaok dancers. 575

(10) Distribution of presents to validate the susaok dannces and the names thereby acquired by the initiates.

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

*556 [575] (11) Dismissal of the supernatural power possessed by the susaok initiates, thereby enabling them to return to normal life in the community.

*556 ●578 171 All day, food is being distributed in X's house with guests in almost constant attendance. Not only are large presents of food made to any chief who has previously shown generosity to X, but he also takes this opportunity to bestow insults on anyone from whom he has received the same. Among the Bella Bella and people of Rivers Inlet guests were frequently ridiculed with respect to their habitual diet or mode of life. Unquestionably, the Bella Coola sometimes did likewise, both at potlatches and at kusiut rites to which strangers were invited. Although it is dangerous to dogmatize on this point, because the practice has long since fallen into disuse, it appears highly probable that mockeries were less prevalent in Bella Coola than at other places on the coast.

*556 558 628 It is comparatively common, however, for a chief to shame a guest by a lavish disregard for valuables. News is constantly passing from town to town, so that the intended victim usually hears what is in store for him. A guest always takes valuable goods with him when he goes to a potlatch, but one who expects to be insulted takes care to have an unusually large supply. The host seats this particular visitor close to the fire, and during the afternoon or early evening he throws large quantities of grease and food upon it, to demonstrate "the warmth" and "fineness" of his house. The guest experiences physical discomfort from the extreme heat, and suffers mental pangs at having a rival boast of his power and fame. To assert his own importance he will throw goods on the fire, as if they were water to extinguish it, and the host will counter by throwing on more valuables. The contest is continued until the goods of the guest are exhausted, or the host fears to burn more lest he should not have enough left to validate the potlatch. He who has destroyed most is considered to have shown his superiority. [578] The Bella Coola state that such rivalry was unknown between chiefs of the same village.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

426 hence repayment or non-repayment does not affect the stand-*556 ing of the debtor in the community. The giver expects no return, but should he come to financial straits he would have [558] no hesitation in asking aid from the Bella Bella chief. He expects, moreover, that the latter will contribute to the expenses of his funeral. This would be optional, as repayment of a non-ceremonial present concerns the donor and recipient alone, without effect on the status of either in the community. In this instance, if the old man had died soon after his son, his debts would not have been paid, since there were surviving no immediate relatives. Sons or other near kinsmen always settle the debts of dead parents out of family pride, but it is considered most improper for the creditors to think about re-[558] payment. By giving they have shown their power, the question of return is the concern of the family of the deceased recipient.

Very rarely does the donor of a potlatch fail to return his investment presents except through oversight. In spite of every precaution, errors occur, and these are said to be caused either by a supernatural being, itself invisible, rising between [776] the donor and his guest, hiding the latter, or by Snuqwalnikaista stealing away his thoughts. Unless the donor wishes
●[578] to insult a guest, he will give him presents later on, and that ends the matter. But if he does not do so, the slighted man
426 may return the insult, and thus feuds are often generated that
*556 may lead to war between tribes. About 1860 it is said
648 that a conflict between the people of Bella Bella and Rivers Inlet was caused in that way. In the autumn of 1921, a Bella Coola chief insisted on dancing at a Bella Bella potlatch, although it was commonly known he did not have the necessary goods for distribution to validate his dance. The hosts waxed sarcastic, taunts were answered by taunts, and only the presence of some white men prevented bloodshed. Relations between the two tribes are still strained as a result of this [828] incident. The Bella Coola chief was subject to spells of insanity, and danced during one of these. According to the

CHAPTER V

FEATURES ASSOCIATED WITH THE POTLATCH

Heralds—Totem-Poles—Coppers—Professional Prerogatives—A'alk Dances—Miscellaneous Ceremonies

128 *556 THE ritual of the potlatch is so complicated that, in order to present a coherent account of it, it has been necessary to omit entirely some features that occur at many potlatches, and to refer briefly to others. This chapter is devoted to an elaboration of these points, thus avoiding the use of lengthy foot-notes in the preceding chapter.

HERALDS

203 *556 The principal functions of heralds[1] have already been described. They go from house to house inviting the people to assemble for the different ceremonies connected with the potlatch, but that is only one of their many duties. They likewise bear invitations to all types of ceremonies, such as marriages, mourning rites, or kusiut dances; in fact, they act as town criers. A person holding any public rite requests one or more heralds to deliver the invitation which is repeated in every house of the village in order from bottom to top.[2]

There are variations, of course, according to the rites to be performed. At a potlatch, the first duty of a herald is to seat the guests in their proper places. This requires not only a good memory, but also considerable tact, since errors with foreign guests cause friction and embarrassment, and diminish the prestige of the whole ceremony. During the actual progress of the rites, a herald must constantly add dignity to the occa-

[574] [628] [578]

[1]Herald, *ā'lk*ᵛ, plural, *waā'lk*ᵛ*ats*, not to be confused with a'alk, the name of a society (I, p. 273).

[2]This order may once have had a ceremonial significance but it has been considered for a long time merely a matter of convenience. When giving presents also, a man follows the same order in his mind and names first the occupants of the bottom house, thus minimizing the danger of overlooking a guest.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

village at some ceremony, exactly as a child's name is conferred. Designations are chosen with respect to the appearance of the copper, or some incident connected with its history. Such a designation is Qwaixwos, "Begrimed," applied to a copper thrown many times into the fire. If, for instance, $50 be expended for a name, the value of a $30 copper is henceforth $80. 435 552 556*

(3) By Making Gifts. The owner of a copper can increase its value by calling together the other chiefs of his village, and sometimes of adjacent ones as well. After the customary meal, the owner expounds the history of his possession, giving details of its value. Then he passes it to one of his guests, who, unless he wishes to insult his host, must hold it upright, that is, with the broad end uppermost. The owner gives it in turn to each of his guests. To validate the display, the owner must bestow gifts on all present, and the total value of these is added to the value of the copper. Such gifts are not strictly returnable, although it is customary for chiefs to show their generosity and prowess to their fellows by a later repayment with interest. 435 556* [578] [426]

By these means the original purchaser of a worthless copper can increase its value to such a point that it can be used at a potlatch. There is no established custom about this. Coppers are not as valuable in Bella Coola as, for instance, at Fort Rupert, and it is unlikely that any are ever worth more than $300, and the average value is probably between $150 and $200. Considerable time is required to raise the value of a copper to this sum and the owner in many cases finds that he has all the other requirements before his copper is ready for use. In that case, he tries to buy another which has been raised to sufficient worth by its owner. Everyone knows the values of the different coppers in the community, and the intending purchaser calls his fellow-chiefs to his house and offers to buy one valued, for example, at $150. If the owner consents to sell, he usually endeavours to get as much as possible, perhaps $175. The sum is publicly paid and is henceforth the value of the copper, which is transmitted to the new [171] 435 437 556*

pended, so that it serves as a visible and tangible memorandum 556* of the chief-like generosity of its owner. By means of these [435] media, debts are passed from one individual to another without [426] actual liquidation in goods; in fact, it is unlikely that the Bella Coola possess sufficient money to meet the sums represented by their coppers.

Professional Prerogatives

The importance of prerogatives in the lives of the Bella 424 Coola has already been noted in many connections. A man's name is his only because his ancestral family has the preroga- 556* tive of using that designation; a kusiut dance can be performed only by an individual with the necessary prerogative; specific totem-pole designs, the portrayal of bird or animal on spoons, [532] seats, house-posts, and other objects is a right dependent upon an ancestral prerogative; as is also the area on which a man can hunt or fish. The concept colours all Bella Coola life. [796]
Not only is a man's ceremonial life based on this principle, but on it depend his actions as chief, and the economic sources of his food-supply. No prerogative, even though it be the pro- [431] perty of a man, is effective until validated by the distribution of presents. Much of a man's energy throughout life is ex- [627] pended on the validation and display of his prerogatives; most Bella Coola feuds are caused by the infringement of one indi- [578] vidual on another's rights.

In addition to the various types already mentioned, there 424 are a number of professional prerogatives on which depend a man's vocation. That of herald approximates this class, al- 463 though the Bella Coola consider it rather as a right operative 556* only during ceremonials. Professional prerogatives rest on the belief that a man's ability as a hunter, wood-worker, and so forth does not rest in his innate skill, but upon an inherited right which must be confirmed and validated by the distribution of presents. These can be given at any convenient time when the people have been called together, but, as it is to the man's advantage to have his right made known as widely

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

701 than that of anyone else. The Bella Coola do not rationalize
156 in a scientific manner; if a man holds a belief firmly, he acts on it without questioning its logic. Moreover, if a professional warrior functions a number of times, this in itself is enough to strengthen his conviction that he must act henceforth in the same way. It can be said with confidence that the owner of [463] a professional prerogative has considerable belief in his own powers, that this acts on himself to render him proficient, and that the majority of the community have respect for his capabilities.

555 THE PROFESSION OF SINGER

533 either through natural ability or an ancestral prerogative. There is a constant need for men able to sing and compose [463] songs for every kind of ceremonial, so a young man of talent has little difficulty in gaining admittance to the choir. He may even win great distinction and become recognized as the leading authority on musical matters. None the less, his success is considered to be accidental and unsubstantial, lacking the foundation that comes from the possession of a duly validated professional prerogative. A person made a singer by the latter means may be entirely unable to compose; in this case he is not a member of the choir, although he enjoys the social distinction which he has won by distributing goods to confirm his professional name. The singer most respected is he who combines with natural ability a confirmed prerogative to give substance and power to his position and composi-
[553] tions. At the death of such an one, an effort is always made [428] by the members of his ancestral family to transmit the name to a youth who has shown musical promise. Arguments and [578] differences of opinion are common among the members of the choir and in such cases the self-assurance and influence of a man whose position has been made strong by the distribution of presents often outweighs that of one who can rely only on his actual ability.

539 to the cave and greeted their long-lost brother affectionately. Though
575 he, too, was delighted at the reunion, he said but little, and for two days told them nothing of his experiences. They remained in camp and on the third night Ätkwi told his brothers that he had obtained supernatural hunting powers. The following morning the four went out and killed so many mountain goats that the cave was filled with their carcasses. Their good fortune was amazing. Ätkwi sent one of his brothers to invite to the cave not only the people of Kimsquit but of the whole countryside as well. While he was absent on this errand, the remaining three prepared and smoked the meat, taking care to preserve the leg bones.

Within two weeks the guests began to assemble. Anokokwläls was a good place for a ceremony because Ätkwi had decorated it with paintings after its roof had opened to show him the upper regions of space.[12] When all the people had arrived, the host gave a mountain goat leg-bone to each, asking every recipient to beat time with it. Then Ätkwi danced [535] a nusqwal dance, imitating the one he had seen done by the goat. After performing, he unfolded the story of his adventures and finished by giving away valuable presents of smoked meat and goat grease. Thus was initiated this particular nusqwal dance.

In later years, Ätkwi had such phenomenal success in hunting that by distributing the spoil he was able to create and confirm for his youngest [551] brother the name, Nuslakwalämi, "The One Who is Always Successful." This has since been transmitted from one generation to another. Ätkwi, [103] too, is responsible for the name of Mount Tcopinäti, "Leg-Bones." On one occasion he killed a large number of mountain goats on the mountain and left their leg-bones, tcopinäti, piled together near the spot. He instructed everyone to refer to the mountain by that name, which has since been done.

EARLY HISTORY OF THE SOCIETY

575 A few words should be said about the reputed early history
578 of the a'alk society. Its members seem always to have been on the best of terms with the sisaok, and there is no mention of feuds between these two organizations. On the other hand, there is said to have been constant friction with members of the kusiut society.[13] The latter comprises a large number of individuals bound together by the possession of supernatural patrons and claiming to possess supernatural powers. In contrast to the a'alk, the kusiut are well organized and regulated; its members are proud of their powers, and scornful of those who lack the same. Under these circumstances, it is not difficult to understand jealousy between the two. Until relatively recent times, the a'alk were numerically stronger, and included some chiefs, whereas the strength of the kusiut society depended on the supernatural strength claimed by its members. It is true that individuals occasionally belonged to both, if they happened to possess prerogatives of both kinds, but, as a rule, the a'alk were young men and the kusiut were older people. This rivalry was formerly so intense that all who were not members of the latter society were often termed a'alk irrespective of whether or not they actually possessed dances of that type; Carrier Indians alone were not so designated. During the summer, members of the two societies dwelt amicably together, but during the winter, when dances took place, there were continual bickerings. The kusiut constantly endeavoured to impress their rivals with their own prowess; while the a'alk, not convinced of the others' power, used to mock them in their songs. This was the usual practice in case of some error in kusiut ritual. The a'alk frequently disobeyed the orders of the kusiut and a number of them once tried to pry up a huge boulder beneath which was the "power" of a certain kusiut (II, p. 8). In recent years the kusiut society has entirely gained the supremacy, but it is agreed by all Bella Coola that in former years this was by no means the case, and that a'alk did not hesitate even to kill one of their rivals.

Miscellaneous Ceremonies

The rites described in this chapter and the one preceding comprise the potlatch of the Bella Coola so far as its details could be learnt. Until the increase of wealth in recent years, the potlatch was rare, and it is unlikely that in any village more than one month in the year was consumed in the 584 preliminary agreement may have been made while they were only seven or eight years old, though marriage seldom occurs before the age of seventeen or eighteen. More often the agreement is made when X and Y have passed the age of puberty, and they wait for about two years before marrying.

583 Throughout this period, X's relatives are expected to give at least one feast at which Y's relatives are the guests of honour,
425 and always receive presents. At one of these rites X's father,
553 with the concurrence of his relatives, may mark his approval
[584] of the coming event by bestowing on Y's father, or one of her other relations, an ancestral name from his family myth. This does not become the absolute property of Y's family, since the myth in which it is embodied does not belong to them, unless, of course, they are members of the same ancestral family. It is fitting that a name of this kind be bestowed by the recipient on one of Y's children, or returned to X's family a few generations later by a return marriage. If this is not done, in course of time the designation is apt to be regarded by Y's family as their own. If there are no children, Y's relatives should give back the name to X's [627] family, but there are many instances of feuds caused by failure to do so. According to mythology, prerogatives may some-
[773] times be given outright, without thought of their use by the resultant children, or of their being restored by return marriages. It is claimed that the people of the Kimsquit River
[648] have, through such a present, the inalienable title to use a certain spot in the Kitlobe River for their olachen nets, and likewise the Kitlobe people have an irrevocable right to the Kimsquit name Stálhmy. These two prerogatives were transferred at the beginning of time. At present, anyone bestowing outright his family prerogatives would be considered weak-
[578] minded and the other members of the ancestral family would strenuously object. Considerations of this sort make it desirable to seek a wife within the ranks of the ancestral family.

During the period of engagement, Y's family may present a name, or names, to X's father, with the same conditions as those just described.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

585 if a grandchild be born they will give him a certain name if a
553 boy, and another if a girl, so that henceforth no one can take 425 that title for himself, even though it is not in use. As already mentioned, even when a name has duly passed to one of the children, it can be recalled in future generations by a return marriage. The transmission of names, or the promising of them for children yet unborn, is perhaps the most binding feature of the whole marriage rite. Mythology contains instances in which names, and other prerogatives, have been given away outright. Cases are cited by the Bella Coola where a father has given hunting-grounds as "food" for the use of the relatives of his son- or daughter-in-law, but it is usual merely to promise the use of them to the grandchildren.

581 Since the transference of names, or other prerogatives, is 553 the foundation stone of Bella Coola marriages, it is necessary
578 to digress still further in an attempt to analyse the concepts 425 at the base of the transaction. If the contracting parties are members of different ancestral families, or even of different branches of the same family, there is a feeling of strain and unpleasantness at the intimate relations into which they are brought. There is a conflict of desires. On one hand is the wish to keep the family prerogatives from going afield; on the other, a wish that they should go afield to show the respect felt for the bride or bridegroom. If children result, the matter is simple, since they are equally members of the ancestral families of mother and father and form a bond which draws the two social units into the closest community of interest. Return marriages will then be sought by successive generations, until the prerogatives of the two families become so closely interwoven that a child will, indeed, be born into the ranks of related ancestors from both parents. But when there are no children the matter is complicated, since the recipients of names not uncommonly try to keep them unjustly. They may do so with the best intentions, feeling that it would be a slight to the donors to give them back. Bella Coola etiquette is not sufficiently exact to stipulate what should be done. If the name is not returned, the donors may be offended at its being kept; if it is returned, they may be offended that it has not been kept. 581 553 578 425

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948

The following examples will help to explain this rather complex point.

About 1900 the sister of a man who was middle-aged in 1922 was married to a Bella Coola to whom she was not related. At the wedding, her father being dead, her brother expounded one of the family's origin myths, and she took her husband a name from it. It was said to have been" hauled across," the word used being the same as that signifying the dragging of a heavy timber, suggesting, of course, the importance and dignity of the designation in question. On two later occasions the woman's family gave valuable presents to the man's, thus doing their part to cement the qwlan, the strength which comes to both families by an interchange of presents marking the dignity of marriage, in fact, its basic principle. Unfortunately, there were no children. If the husband had wished to retain these names for his family, he should have arranged a further marriage between one of his own relatives and one of his wife's, to return the value of gifts he had received. He did not do so, and thus lost all legal claim to the designations in question. None the less, he was indignant when his wife's brother duly validated one of these names for himself at a potlatch, as if it had been dormant.

The accompanying diagram-pedigree shows another instance of the same kind. Smaoun's daughter, Swalkanals, was married to Ninitsamlais, and at the wedding her father promised his name for any offspring. No children were born, but Ninitsamlais illegally used the designation, Smaoun, for King George, his son by another wife. This naturally incensed the relatives of the first Smaoun, especially as the debt could not be adjusted by the marriage of one of Ninitsamlais's daughters to one of their family, since there were no daughters. To make matters worse, King George passed the name to his son, Jack King George, and again there were no daughters to readjust the debt. Finally, Jack King George married Qwalal, a relative of the first Smaoun, without the usual lengthy period of engagement, and while she was still concealed for the year that follows puberty. No children resulted, by which part of the debt could have been repaid. Thus, not only did Jack King George violate the customary ideas of decency, but in the course of three generations two women were obtained from the Smaoun family without any recompense. Bitter feelings arose, and a few years ago one of the descendants of the first Smaoun took the name for himself at a potlatch as if it had been dormant, thus arousing the ire of Jack King George. In 1911 [482]

581 one of his female relatives were murdered at Kitsumpalo. The slayer was 583 never detected, but most of the Bella Coola believe that it was done by one of Snamut's relatives, and that the dispute about names was quite sufficient to furnish an excuse for the deed.

425 It is hoped that these two instances will serve to emphasize why the [L12] Bella Coola prefer marriages within the ranks of the aristocrat family.
When this rule plays, names are usually given outright, and not merely promised for the use of the future children.

586 After this digression, to return to the marriage of X and Y.
The ceremony is taking place in the house of Y's father, and the parents of each participant have expounded parts of their origin myths, and promised names for the resultant children.

Then Y's relatives give numerous presents to X's family, in each case including those who are associating themselves with the contract. Canoes, slaves, blankets, and other articles of great worth are given; they are said to be "bed covering" for Y. The greater their value, the greater her prestige. Her [597] father asks a female child to address the assemblage, speaking as though he were Y. He says in effect:

"My father, my mother, my brothers, my uncles, and their associates have given me my bed covering."

These presents are the binding factors of the wedding.
They are said to lock the girl in her husband's house, and accordingly are sometimes called, "rope fastenings." This is [597] only done when a woman is married for the first time.
[597] Another orator now holds forth on behalf of Y's father:

"What we do today is no small matter. We have done today what was done in former times, and what shall be done in the future."

two, but only one of great importance could hope to aspire to more, while the case of Pathe was considered to be unique and highly desirable.

A chief's wives always lived in the same house, and it is said that disputes were frequent. Pathe endeavoured to prevent jealousy by providing each woman with a special bedroom and sleeping for a single night with each in order. One informant had two wives when a young man, and he found that the only way to avoid constant bickering was by sleeping in one bed, between them. The evidence seems clear that plurality of wives was usually the cause of considerable friction, though this never deterred a man from taking a second wife if he could. The only special rule of incest in this regard was that two sisters could not be selected at the same time.

In answer to questions about polyandry, two men told of a licentious woman who had two feeble-minded husbands between whom she used to sleep. The whole affair was considered disgusting, but public opinion did not correct the offenders since a person's marital affairs were considered to concern the individual only. It was accordingly assumed that the institution of true polyandry did not exist, when, unexpectedly, information was volunteered about its occurrence in the families of influential men. A very powerful chief, if his only child was a daughter, quite frequently married her simultaneously to the sons of other chiefs. She was then considered most fortunate, since only a wealthy man could provide for a daughter in this way, and expend the large quantities of goods necessary to secure her proper marriage in each case. The husbands were never brothers, and seldom related, since the ambitious parent wished to ally his daughter with different ancestral families for the benefit of any resultant children. The joint wife was accustomed to live for a number of months in the house of one of her husbands, with her other husbands forming part of his household. She would then move to the house of another, who assumed the leadership of the group,

556 prerogatives he is transmitting, Y's father usually takes the 563 opportunity of stating that he wishes to hunt on X's hunting-
[425] grounds, or fish in his fishing-grounds. Permission is never refused, though it is only for the period of the potlatch. Since Y's father is to assist X, it is considered fitting to grant him facilities for obtaining pelts and food.

It is on the afternoon of the second day of the potlatch that the goods are delivered. They serve six purposes, which can be described separately, although the Bella Coola usually think of them as being too closely associated for division.

(1) They increase the dignity, influence, and prestige of the donors. This theme needs no further elaboration. When X later gives these presents to his foreign guests, he announces the person from which he has received them and in this way knowledge of the manner in which Y's relatives have upheld the dignity of the marriage is spread far and wide, to their inverse gratification.

(2) They help X to rise to a position of influence in the community by the credit which comes to him from their lump distribution. Though a man may acquire goods in various ways, the Bella Coola allow that without contributions from his wife's relatives no man can become a chief.

(3) They validate the transmission of names, or other prerogatives, taken by Y to her husband. Even presents given [426] directly from father-in-law to son-in-law are always said to have been taken by the daughter to her husband.

(4) Indirectly, they increase the prestige of the children,
[554] either here or that time or who may appear later. None of the goods used for repurchasing their mother can actually be used for their benefit, but the whole rite gives them strength to succeed in life. A child whose mother has not been repurchased is said to be unable to walk, as if his legs were powerless; to lack intelligence, and the ability to prosper. From the [576] merry quarrels of childhood until old age, a person is proud to recall the number of times his mother was redeemed, and to devote this statement in the work of those less fortunate.

Ib McDowell E-5 (1922-1924)948
NEA Bellacoola NEA

(c) They govern Y's status in this world. When women quarrel, as they often do, the most common boast to shame a less wealthy rival is a reminder of the number of times the speaker was repurchased and the value of the goods used. 556 583 [577]

"I can sit down on fifteen canoes," or "I am carried by five slaves," says the angry woman, mentioning whatever goods were used for her repurchase.

(d) Finally, these goods serve a more definite purpose in obtaining for Y a name, or names, of which the value is directly proportionate to the expenditure, precisely as the importance of a chief's designation depends on the goods used to validate it. [558]

As with men's names, some women's appellations were given by Alquentin to the first arrivals; others were created on this earth with regard to peculiar events, and still others are names which can be used either by men or women. Theoretically, the dignity of the first type of name is greater than either of the others, but in practice the importance of the owner depends on the number of times she has bought herself from her husband; the principles governing the rank of women are thus the same as those already described for men. The name yaiwil, applied to a woman who has many times ransomed herself and so reached a position of eminence, is the feminine equivalent to siilhemp. The creation of women's names in reference to personal characteristics or incidents connected with their marital life is more common than similar creations for men. The ritual of the bestowal of a name on Y, here given, was omitted from the description of the potlatch in order to lessen the complexity of that ceremony. It will be remembered that on the afternoon of the second day of the potlatch Y's relatives appear outside X's house, carrying valuable presents. 551 556 583 [554] [562] 553 556 583

The announcer calls out that Y's father has come to give "food" to X and his relatives. By food, presents are meant, which are the return, with interest, of the gifts given by X's relatives on various occasions. The giver is announced, for other relatives than Y's father contribute, and to whom the

551 with respect to their appearance or actions on this earth. As [553] far as could be learnt, the procedure of bestowal is identical with that just described. The following examples illustrate designations of this type:

T̈silkalinxwnlaix, "The Resident Maker." In the begin-[773] ning of time the wife of Taiatwala had twins so often that the village rapidly increased in population. Accordingly she took this name for herself when she rebought herself from her husband. It was transmitted for generations in the ancestral family of Taiatwala's descendants until lent about one hundred years ago. The recipients claimed it as their own and passed it to a certain Omqomkilska, recently deceased, who gave it to her brother's daughter at the time of her marriage. Since this woman's husband has not yet given a potlatch the name is accordingly in a degraded condition at the present time (1923).

551 Ollkwelqa, "I Am the Worthless One." The mother-in-law
578 of this woman had been in the habit of insulting her daughter-646 in-law by saying, even when strangers were present:

"We have a worthless daughter-in-law."

On relinquishing herself the woman advertised the rudeness of her husband's mother by throwing her words back in her teeth.

Nakalakalu, "I Am the One Whose Eyes Are Hungry." The mother-in-law of this woman used to eat without offering food to her son's wife.

Nakalxwinqlilu, "The One Whose Haunches Are Dusty." Her mother-in-law did not give her a place to sit in the house so that she was forced to stay close to the fire in the ashes.

Ewilalaix, "The One Who Sits Where There Is No Space." Her mother-in-law objected to this woman sitting near her husband when he took his ceremonial seat, and insulted her with the above remark.

551 Nawaste'ax, "The Stingy One." It was said that this 578 woman exercised her husband's generosity until he gained an unpleasant reputation for parsimony. She publicly shamed

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

her husband's critics by taking this name for herself when she rebought herself from him. 551 578

Nu'aoi, "The Inhospitable One." Her husband received this reputation owing to his wife's manners, so she advertised what had been said about him.

Nuphätlsikän, "Heedlessly Deaf." This woman's mother-in-law claimed that she deliberately failed to hear what she was told to do, and applied the above epithet to her. The daughter-in-law confounded her by taking it as her own name. [606]

When a name of this type is assumed it is always announced when, where, and for what purpose it was first created. 553

A description has already been given of the actual ritual by which X bestows the goods acquired from the repurchase of Y, but it is necessary to enlarge on the prohibition against their use for the direct benefit of one of the children of the couple. The theory is that the goods bind the marriage contract and express in a practical and lofty form the kindly sentiments with which Y's relatives regard her husband, and the bond between the two families, hence they must be used solely for the benefit of him and his relatives. A man usually applies these goods to initiate the children of his brothers or sisters into the ranks of the nuaek or kusiat. It is unthinkable for goods to be delivered without an exposition of Y's family's glories, but if this should ever take place, there would be no difficulty in applying them to the direct benefit of her children. When used, for example, to make a child of X's brother a nuaek, he is a living testimony of the noble way in which Y's relatives have done that which is fitting for the family of her husband. Due to accidents in announcing and storing of presents, it sometimes happens that those obtained by the repurchasing of Y are used for the benefit of her own children. Unless this error is corrected, the child could always be shamed by having it said: 556 583 [558]

"You are a mere nobody. The goods expended in the

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

looked upon with contempt by her family, was yet determined that nothing she had done should ruin her children's chances in life. Accordingly she donated $300 to her ex-husband to rebuy herself. Marriage is accepted as a matter of course, but to be many times repurchased is the goal of every ambitious woman. In Tăl-io the custom prevails of depicting on the rocks the number of coppers paid for repurchasing a wife. Thus her fame is displayed to all. 556 583 [184 532]

It is somewhat difficult for a white man to realize what a privilege the family of a wife considers it to repurchase her from her husband. If the latter is unwilling to give a potlatch, his relatives-in-law may urge him to do so, and if he still declines to exert himself they take the drastic step of inviting their fellow-villagers to assemble in his house where, with these guests as witnesses, the wife's relatives give presents to her husband and his relations. They may make this presentation at any gathering where they are assured of a large audience. In so doing the donors have demonstrated their proper sentiments, in spite of the inertness of the husband.

The assistance which the relatives of a wife have given her husband is a matter about which they can boast for the rest of their lives, a fact impressed upon the writer by listening to a quarrel between two Bella Coola men. One of them owned a horse and waggon which the other had hired to move some goods. The latter became very angry, claiming that the former had overcharged him and must be poor and greedy to be so eager to acquire money. The teamster, thus deeply insulted, silenced the other man by reminding him that the only reason he was wealthy was by means of the goods used to repurchase his, the teamster's, sister from her husband, brother of the man with whom he was disputing. To the observer the dispute was made more interesting by the fact that both the husband and wife had been dead for at least fifteen years, but their families had not ceased to remember the financial obligations connected with the marriage. 556 583 578

556 A man who is giving a ceremony of any kind can offer few greater insults to his wife's relatives than omission to ask their assistance. The following is a good instance of such an insult:

602

About 1900 a man and woman were married and had three children. Then the mother died, before being repurchased from her husband. In addition, the husband had assisted his wife's father when one of his younger children had died; so that it was most fitting that the wife's relatives should contribute to any ceremony given by the husband. Four years later the husband proposed to marry once more, and to have the wedding occur at a potlatch. But on the day of xlatanum, he insulted the relatives of his dead wife by failing to invite them. The cause of the feud was not disclosed, but the husband increased it by again failing to invite her family when, during the potlatch, they should have rebought her for the benefit of his young relatives about to be initiated into the ranks of the xusak. The father of the dead woman came forward uninvited with a large present for each, saying in effect:

"I, too, have a right to contribute to add prestige to my daughter and her children."

In this way he defeated the wiles of his son-in-law who had hoped to shame his father-in-law by the failure of the latter to contribute to his potlatch. The son-in-law endeavoured to excuse himself by saying that his late wife's relatives had not assisted for so long that he thought they would not wish to do so. This retort further incensed the father of the dead woman so that next day he and his wife publicly gave the donor of the potlatch $300 "to make clean where we sit."

This somewhat lengthy description has been necessary to explain the important part which the repurchase of wives plays in the lives of the Bella Coola; it is one of the fundamentals of society and is, therefore, worthy of attention.

DISSOLUTION OF MARRIAGE

768 Either death or divorce can terminate marriage. The de-[586] cease of a wife is an unfortunate affair, quite apart from the grief which it may cause her husband. Two families have been brought into peculiarly close relations through her, and now the bond itself has snapped; delicate financial arrangements have been undertaken, and it is not easy to settle these without ill-feeling, particularly if the alliance was a return marriage. If no child has been born, and no repurchasing of the wife entertained such kindly sentiments towards him that he would be glad to have his friend receive it.

In recent years the number of incombustible objects has increased enormously with the introduction of metal utensils, gramophones, and other things obtained from white traders. Although these are considered to be of use to the ghost, and must be carefully placed near the grave, they can be publicly exchanged for others by a relative. The sentiments expressed on such occasions are that the ghost, though aware of what is taking place, does not resent an open transfer; and that it is unnecessary to deposit the equivalent of what has been removed. There is undoubtedly a vague idea that the ghost uses, not the actual object, but its essence, which is received by the deposition. It must be emphasized that this feeling has not become crystallized to such a state that it is customary to replace goods laid on the grave with others. Such an exchange is a rare event and would cause animosity if carried out by anyone except a near relative.

Sometimes a dying person requests that a house be erected over his grave, a common Bella Bella custom. This is built immediately after the funeral and articles that cannot be burnt are placed within it instead of being piled on the ground. The sorrowing relatives may choose to erect a picket fence around the spot, but no other mark for the grave is put up until a memorial potlatch several years after death. House or fence soon falls into decay and rarely an effort is made to repair either. Nor is the grave itself disturbed. Cow-parsnips, which are much used for food, grow frequently in cemeteries, but no one would gather the shoots that rise above a grave; they are food belonging to the dead person. The white man has taught the Bella Coola how to plant apple-trees and these are often set out in graveyards, though the fruit is allowed to fall to the ground for the benefit of those interred beneath. The Bella Bella are said formerly to have replaced at intervals the coffin containing a dead person, but this seems never to have been a Bella Coola practice. Indeed, a grave is never tense throughout this chapter, and to assume the presence of a number of young men and women ignorant of the significance of the rites. Formerly, the kukusiut often had difficulty in impressing the uninitiated with their prowess, and feuds with the a'alk were common.

Although membership in the kusiut society depends on an ancestral prerogative, it is essentially a democratic institution. A certain amount of wealth is necessary to validate a kusiut prerogative, but nothing comparable to that required for a potlatch; in fact, poor men are often persons of great importance within the ranks of the society. Nor are the prerogatives considered to be as valuable as ancestral rights, so that slaves are often admitted as kukusiut by their masters. An important kusiut is not esteemed by the community in the same way as the donor of many potlatches; in short, membership in the society brings limited ceremonial and semi-religious advantage, not social prestige of a public nature.

Powers and Functions of the Society

Any secret society can be viewed from the standpoints of a member, and of a non-member. The scope of the kusiut organization can be most clearly outlined by describing first what an uninitiated person knows about it. From his infancy, parents impress upon a child the supernatural powers of the kukusiut and the dangers attached to their rites. Such instruction is perhaps strongest where one, or both, is not a member. They then voice their own fears, and do not merely deceive for the good of the society. Steeped as every child is in a firm belief of the near presence of the supernatural, he readily believes what he is told. He learns, for example, that if, without special invitation, he dares enter the house where a kusiut dance is taking place—at any time during the four days or more that it lasts—his spirit will be drawn from him. This is sufficient to deter him from prying too closely into the rites. Strangely enough, there seem always to have been differences in teaching with respect to this deception. It is believed that if a non-

though the cost of validating such a prerogative is less than a potlatch, yet a Cannibal dance, for example, entails considerable expenditure, so a man entitled to give such a ceremony frequently lends his right to another, or it may lie dormant for generations. Like other loaned prerogatives, failure to return is a frequent cause of feud. A man frequently gives away a kusiut name-prerogative, and if he should give away all of them, he becomes legally an uninitiated. In such a case it is customary for his wife, or some relative, to give him a new kusiut prerogative, as is likewise the case when a master causes a slave to be initiated. A name is sometimes given to a person who resembles a deceased relative of the donor. 575* 424 425 553 [556] [578] [426]

(2) A Patron, omätuts. Little need be said on this point. The words of the songs used by the dancer often describe his patron, always couched in mystical terms for the benefit of the uninitiated. If the supernatural associate performs any type of dance at the gathering above, so can his protégé perform on this earth, otherwise his power is limited to singing of the being. If an individual inherits prerogatives with the same patron from two different relatives, he can merge these to give a composite dance, with consequent additional power. Greedy individuals sometimes illegally add features to which they are not entitled, a cause of bitter feelings. Or one individual may own several prerogatives with different patrons. Although most kukusiut have only one, yet two or three are not uncommon and one case is known of a man with six distinct patrons. The uninitiated believe that from any one of these may come the call giving him the power to perform. 575* 424 776 [533] [535] [578]

(3) A Repository. In this subterranean shelter his name remains, guarded by Änoºlikwolsaix. An individual with several prerogatives has a repository for each. 575* 424 778

Although the kukusiut are aware that much of their ritual is deception, it is clear that they believe in the supernatural origin of their rites, and that their ancestors actually had the abilities which their descendants of today imitate. In time [773] [781]

[The Dance of NoaKxnim]

773 approaches the Bella Coola River, and proceeds up it, beneath 824 the surface of the water, invisible to all. Its destination is 825 Smaien·a, whence its captain leaps to Nusqulxwaista to await the coming of Ăłquntăm. The crew consists of a number of supernatural beings, who will be described in connection with the ceremonial on the night of nabusam. This canoe, which brings the salmon and berries to Bella Coola, has four masts but no sails, and is enormous. Whenever the weather is fine, Noăkxnim lowers first one side and then the other of his craft so that the salmon may leave; after swimming around for a time they always return, refreshed by their exercise. In former [785] times when people were purified by ceremonial chastity, sev-
[831] eral succeeded in seeing the craft, and from them it is known [787] that it is about six hundred yards in length, that it travels without leaving a wake, that any canoes passing near are sucked along after it, and that a mallard duck, perched on the bow, quacks continuously. Intelligent informants agreed that the bringing of the salmon during the autumn was inconsistent, but they could offer no explanation. One man believed that this was pointed out not many years ago by a man whose [626] patron was Noăkxnim, but that the marshals requested him [776] not to upset established ritual by too much logic. Noăkxnim is patron for several kukusiut, who are believed by the unini-575 tiated to be able to see his canoe. As he passes up the river
*796 the kusiut dances begin.

184 It is unnecessary to describe the full ritual in each village, [424] as this is supposed to be identical, and probably contains only [551] slight variations, if any. In Tsimotl the kusiut who has the prerogative of seeing Noăkxnim is a certain Qaxolăn·i,[11] in Kimsquit, Ałuskinmasam,[12] and in Skikiatl, Xemtnim. Although,

[115] [11]Details of this dance were learnt from the father of Qaxolăn·i, who intimated
[426] that the name was a family possession. Several months later an old woman [578] referred to the lending of this designation by her father and said that the present user had failed to return it. Bitter feelings are often caused by disputes of this kind.

[12]Meaning "Cloud Covered," a reference to the invisibility of his patron, as if the latter were hidden by clouds. Many kusiut names have significances of this type.

[The Cannibal Dance]

if the latter agrees to undertake the commission, he must next obtain a slave, a matter of no difficulty if he is at all wealthy. An effort is made to find a victim from the tribe that has committed the murder, though any alien will suffice. The details are worked out with great care so that the slave is sent to the river for water, or on some other errand at the time the call comes to the Cannibal. A shout is raised, and the uninitiated hurriedly run out of the house, followed by the dancer and a body of athletic kukusiut, who pounce on the unsuspecting foreigner. The Cannibal cuts his throat, and the corpse is carried back to his house, where all members of the society are assembling. Part of the body is cut off, then the kukusiut accompany the Cannibal to every house of the village. He carries the mutilated remains, and the uninitiated readily believe that he has devoured the missing portion. The corpse is later dismembered and the bloody pieces displayed, convincing proof of the gruesome meal. It is needless to say that they are carefully buried where there is no danger that they will be found. The rite then proceeds in the usual manner. 575* 796* 567 648

If two biting Cannibals, or their parents, quarrel, they may be shamed into killing and "eating" a slave. Angry words lead to insults, insults to scorn at each other's prowess, until one of the Cannibals throws a stone at the feet of the other, an action which has the significance of: 575* 796* 567 578

Since a stone is always symbolic of a slave, the Cannibal so taunted knows what is expected. If he accepts the challenge, he throws a stone at his adversary's feet, bidding him do likewise. The one challenged soon receives a call and kills a slave in the manner previously described; his rival must do the same unless he is willing to admit himself outdone. The occasional killing of a slave under such circumstances does not give to either the right of doing so habitually. Of course the challenged individual is not bound to accept, but if he declines the "dare," he sinks in popular estimation. This [558]

2: McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948

type of rivalry can be carried out only during the ceremonial season.

After killing and eating a human being, a Cannibal must conceal himself for a considerable period, sometimes as long as four years. The uninitiated are told that the great power within him has taken him so far into the upper regions that one or more years must elapse before his return. During this time he can be seen only by kukusiut. The writer was told of one unfortunate corpse-eating Cannibal, Xekalus, who was virtually secluded for eight years, since a stone was cast at his feet every time he reappeared, thus forcing him to kill and eat. This name had been dormant for a number of years until conferred on the writer, who failed to uphold the prerogative.

One other type of Cannibal prerogative remains to be described, namely, that of biting oneself. This is even less common than that of corpse-eating, being enjoyed only by two individuals, Qolliachmq of Stuix and Smmq of the Kimsquit River. The following account of the origin of the latter's prerogative was obtained:

> Many years ago, soon after the first people came to this world, the ritual of the kusiut dances was much more exacting than it is at present. At that time the inhabitants of the earth were still endowed with such semi-supernatural powers that they were able to perform rites that people of the present day can represent only with the aid of carpenters' devices. There was then living in one of the villages on the Kimsquit River a certain Smmq who had the prerogative of biting himself. He once went hunting on one of the mountains, and when he failed to return the people were convinced that he had eaten so heartily of his own flesh that he had died. Although search was made for his body, it was not until the following year that a professional hunter found the skeleton. From the position of the bones it was judged that their conclusion was correct: he had killed himself by eating too much of his own flesh. The chiefs and other influential kukusiut held a meeting at which it was decided that henceforth kusiut dances would only be acted, not carried out in reality. The following winter the name and prerogative were transmitted to the son of the dead man, who bit himself, but not sufficiently deeply to cause serious injury.

[The Scratch Dance]

*575 424 They[3] do not blacken their faces on receipt of a call as do most kukusiut.

[302] [787] [533] The theme of their songs is of the land above, instead solely of their patrons.

On visiting a house where a qethm or nduxam is taking place they sit with the Cannibals in one of the back corners; this group is given food before any of the other guests.

They do not exercise their prerogative on fellow-Scratchers, Cannibals, or Breakers.

[787] They are liable to frenzy both when the call is upon them and after its departure. In such cases they run forth, apparently guarded and restrained by other kukusiut, and rush into every house to frighten the uninitiated.

They must recompense those whom they have scratched.

[578] They act as peace-makers among the kukusiut, since the necessity of accompanying a Scratcher who pretends to be frenzied overrules all petty causes of strife.

[554] Though any definite concept of graded rank in the kusiut society is quite foreign to the Bella Coola, it is generally felt that Scratchers and Breakers are only slightly less important than Cannibals. The patron of every Scratcher is Sne'oluls Alqustām, one of the sons of Alqustām; this supernatural being [776] scratches the supernatural ones in the land above, and his father alone can restrain him. The prerogative is fairly common, and it is probable that in early days there was at least one Scratcher in every village.

*575 *796 [424] The following account of the ritual was obtained from one of the Bella Coola marshals and describes the manner in which the dance should have been performed by the Scratcher, Alusknais, his daughter's daughter's son, who had recently obtained the prerogative formerly possessed by his deceased mother's father. It will be convenient to refer to Alusknais as X and use the present tense in recording the proper ritual, though it was largely omitted on the last occasion the dance was given.

X arranges a suitable day with the marshals for receiving

[The Breaker Dance]

*575 lsaix. X is one of the few kukusiut having the prerogative of *796 using supernatural singers. The evening's ceremony concludes [424] in the usual fashion.

Until the departure of his call, X is liable to fits of frenzy so that on both qotlm and nebusam he often visits every house and breaks utensils, though his guardians appear to be making every effort to restrain him. Breakers, irrespective of their [424] exact prerogative, are enabled to act in any unusual manner they desire, and strive to excel in peculiar behaviour. A favourite trick is to smear themselves with excrement, either real or imitation. It is difficult to over-estimate the enormous [554] prestige which such actions call forth in the eyes of the unini-
[787] tiated, to whom it appears that the coming of a call entirely [828] alters the mentality of the recipient, a belief which the kukusiut make every effort to maintain. Nothing further need be said of either qotlm or the preliminaries of nebusam, both of which follow the usual pattern.

*575 When the uninitiated are admitted to X's house on nebusam
*796 evening, they are filled with wonder at the sight of the masked 781 singers, of Sänoltxmulelts Alquntäm, and of the four supernatural Breakers who move wildly to and fro as the songs are sung, as if only the eagle down which the kukusiut blow upon them restrains them from destroying property. The fluent Ano°likwolsaix makes the most of her opportunity to describe the wonders which are before their eyes. Then the uninitiated are told that it will be safer for them to withdraw, and hurry out. Presently they are startled to hear the sound of people moving, and the four supernatural Breakers, followed by all the kukusiut, leave the house and proceed to the lowest one in the village. Around the fire go the masked four, picking up stones and hurling them at any destructible property. Most [252] houses contain a number of stones which have been used in [578] boiling liquids, so that there is no lack of missiles. Kukusiut who are wise take care to hide or remove valuable property [685] before this inroad begins, since the wearers of the masks take advantage of the opportunity to destroy the goods of those

they do not like. No compensation can be claimed, on the theory that supernatural beings do not have to pay for any damage they may do. Although the property of some kukusiut is destroyed, the chief sufferers are the uninitiated; this serves to increase their fear and respect for the society with which such all-powerful beings are in league. After visiting every house in the village, the party returns to X's, where the masks are burnt, the call sent back, and the proceedings conclude in the usual manner. 575* 796* 781 [578] [685]

A certain amount of information concerning the history of the Breaker dance was obtained from Syek, the owner of the prerogative just described. He is a well-informed man, but the writer had no opportunity of comparing his beliefs with those of his associates, so the following must be regarded as unsubstantiated evidence. This man stated that the Breaker dance is the most important of all in Bella Bella, and that many Bella Coola prerogatives have been obtained from this source, although some of their first ancestors likewise enjoyed it. He further stated that the term, noltcista, by which the Bella Coola always designate a Breaker, is of Bella Bella origin, and that the ancient Bella Coola term was dirtia.[41] Syek also told of an occasion when a number of Bella Bella, present on the qothm night of a Bella Coola ceremony, were disturbed when eating by the thud of a stone thrown, from outside, against the wall of the back-room. Out rushed a number of kukusiut, incensed at the disrespect shown to their gathering. They caught the offender, but released him when he was found to be a Bella Bella Breaker, foolishly demonstrating his prowess. The marshals decided to retaliate and arranged with two Bella Coola Breakers to exercise their rights and destroy the canoes and food-boxes of their guests. They did so, and later paid for the damage. The Bella Coola were thus able to demon- 575* 796* [115] [171] [177] 575* 796* 648 688

[41] Syek and several of his children are the only Bella Coola known to the writer who habitually use the sound "r." For example, he says "Sealori," instead of "Sealoli." He says that he is himself unable to distinguish any peculiarity in his own pronunciation, although other Bella Coola are aware of it. [197]

[The Drowning Dance]

*575 *796 for a rehearsal. The box is placed on top of the concealed opening; X enters it, raises the flap in the bottom, and opens the trap-door through which he squeezes into the space between the floor of the house and the ground beneath. The false body, clothed like himself, has been placed in readiness and X passes it up into the box which he has just left. Water is then poured in upon it and the movable section of bottom fits sufficiently tightly that none flows out. If everything is satisfactory, the box is returned to its owner for safe-keeping.

When the time for the ceremony comes, the senior kukusiut meet for a final rehearsal after the gothm of a kusiut. Cases are remembered of intentional tampering with the box by [578] some malicious individual, hence the necessity for careful testing. The following night the call comes to X, and he goes to every house of the village with his cry:

"Please speak plainly; I will do what you want."

The ritual of the next four days is identical with that already described and the uninitiated keep wondering what is going to happen. If they should ask any kusiut, the answer given is:

"We don't quite understand what it is. Something dreadful has fallen upon X, but the details are not yet clear."

So the time passes until the night when X is to be drowned. As in other kusiutem dances, the uninitiated are guided to their places in inky darkness and sit there until the weird stillness and awe of it all has had time to take effect upon them. At last the fire is kindled and one of the marshals announces that X wants to borrow a large boiling box from so-and-so, naming the man to whom the prepared one has been entrusted. The owner says that he is willing to lend it and two kukusiut are sent to bring the receptacle. It is placed over the trap-door, and X circles the fire four times while the kukusiut beat time frenziedly with sticks. Suddenly he cries out:

"My patron bids me enter this box and have water poured upon me."

The kukusiut women drone out in fear and the dzayas

[The Mystery Dance]

* 575 with fatal results to his victims. The uninitiated listen and
* 796 are impressed as Ana'likwolsaix confirms and supplements what has just been told them.

532 After a short pause, the announcer cries, O·····, 776 which serves as an invitation and precedes the appearance of every supernatural being. Snunq emerges, a man clad in a bear-skin blanket covered with evergreen tufts, and wearing a mask of which the eyes can be made to swing open or shut by the pulling of concealed cords. The monster does not speak; merely circles the fire, terrifying the beholders by his ferocious expression. When the figure has withdrawn, the announcer explains the significance.

The next to appear is a Deer, Sno'olxlts Alquntäm, "The Foolish Son of Alquntäm." The skin and antlers of a real deer are worn by two men with sticks thrust down the legs to make the representation appear life-like. Two more performers with human masks follow, trying to catch the creature which frisks around the fire and avoids them by escaping back into the enclosure. The announcer informs the audience that this is no ordinary animal, it is a deer from the land above, the son of Alquntäm. This mischievous creature is said frequently to [578] destroy the back-room in his father's house, hence it is a mild term of reproach to call a person Sno'olxlts Alquntäm.

After the usual delay comes the Varied Thrush, an actor
[825] with mask representing a bird. This is considered to be the finest bird songster; the Bella Coola say that all animals, including even mountain goats and halibut, gather to listen to its melody. The performer sings, then withdraws, and the announcer and Ana'likwolsaix explain who has just disappeared.

Next is Wolf, a man wearing a tail and the stuffed head of one of these animals. He circles the fire, howling like a wolf, the performer having been chosen for his ability to imitate that sound. The announcer tells the uninitiated that they have just seen a wolf from Nuxqalwaixts, and have listened to it howling for Alquntäm; as usual, Ana'likwolsaix confirms his one is permitted to leave, and the uninitiated gaze in amazement as the seemingly endless rope continues to be drawn up through the roof, although the rattle itself can no longer be heard as if X had passed beyond earshot. They do not know that he has merely stepped from the ladder to the roof of the house, and thence to the ground, taking care to loop the cord over a projection so that he can continue drawing it out steadily. He has carefully practised rattling so that he can gradually lessen the intensity as if he were passing beyond ear-shot. One of the marshals describes the dangers to which X is exposed on his journey aloft, and calls on the kukusiut to sing his two songs to aid him. They are sung several times, but no others are used during the long night, nor are puppet-patrons employed as in kusietem rites. The rope is being drawn from a large coil on the floor near the fire, and when the carpenters notice that it is nearly exhausted one of their number slips out to tell X to stop his climb. Presently, one or two yards of rope are quickly pulled through the hole in the roof and then all movement stops. 575* 796*

"He has jumped," cry the kukusiut.

A fluent kusiut explains to the uninitiated that the roof of the land above has opened before X's ever-lengthening ladder, that he has leapt from it to the ground above and tied his rope to something. On one occasion, a malicious rival cut the cable hoping that no one would notice the break, but luckily one of the watchful carpenters noticed it in time to knot the two ends. The kukusiut always explain that the rope is X's point of contact with the lower world, and that if it is severed, he cannot return. Accordingly, if the broken end had been drawn up through the roof, X could never have come back, and only his secret death would have served to maintain the reputation of the society. [772] 575* 796* 578● 688

The rope remains stationary for some time, and then is seen to be coming back through the aperture. 575* 796*

"X is returning," whisper the kukusiut to one another and the excitement becomes intense.

with such powers that they killed one another in their performances. Consequently, they decided to dance only in the winter months, and merely to imitate the actions which had been previously carried out. 575* 796* 173

There are other traditions, probably with an historical basis, describing conflicts with the a'alk. The Bella Coola say that long, long ago there were not enough kusiut names for more than the old people to be admitted to the society, and that though members were regarded as having supernatural powers, yet the a'alk, confident in their numbers and strength, used frequently to assail the supremacy of the kukusiut. On one occasion, when the latter had prepared an elaborate feast of smoked goat flesh for themselves, the a'alk collected their weapons and demanded a share of the feast. The kukusiut, furiously angry, felt compelled to yield, though later they took revenge through the destruction wrought by many Cannibals and Scratchers when frenzied. It is said that even recently if the kukusiut did not invite the a'alk to one of their dances, they were always careful to placate them by sending half of the food as a present. 575* 578 173 [424] [551] [491]

Sometimes the a'alk, collectively, were bold enough to kill a kusiut, particularly if something had gone amiss in a dance house. Or other motives might be strong enough to outweigh respect for a member of the society. On one occasion a chief, who was not a member of the society, was told that his wife, who was, had been in the habit of prowling off at night with a Cannibal. The jealous husband prepared his bear-spear and slew the Cannibal when next he entered his house during a frenzied rampage of the village. Kukusiut, both from that village and others in the vicinity, combined to cause the murderer's death with the aid of a member of the society who was a professional killer. 575* 578 682

Success did not always come to the kukusiut in quarrels between members of the two societies. Long ago, the a'alk were invited to a qothm in a village in the upper Bella Coola valley. One of their own dances was taking place, but they 575* 578 796*

*575 accepted the invitation. The house was so crowded that the *578 uninitiated in front were driven forwards by pressure from the *996 rear until they encroached on the space behind the fire. An elderly hamatsa decided that this was a good occasion to frighten the visitors, so he whispered to a recently admitted member of the society:

"You fall down, and I will explain that it is because you have attracted to yourself the spirit of an uninitiated person."

Under most circumstances this would have unnerved the uninitiated, as indeed it did the majority. But the leader of the a'alk, perhaps excited by the dance in which he had just taken part, refused to be impressed. He knew that the hamatsa would threaten to throw the spirit of the offender into the fire, irrevocably compelling the owner to follow it, but he was not afraid.

"Let us see your powers," he said. "Go ahead with your throwing of a spirit into the fire."

The hamatsa responsible for the scheme knew that it must be carried out, and only hoped that, as the spirit was about to be burnt, the owner would offer to pay for its return, as usually happened in such cases. He instructed the fellow hamatsa to pretend and the latter one, fumbled at the back of his neck, as if drawing something forth, and thrust the "something" into the fire. Breathless with fear, the uninitiated waited for someone to be forced into the flames. But nothing happened. It was a dangerous situation for the hamatsa, and as the only means of maintaining their reputation, they began to whisper that the man must have accidentally extracted his own spirit instead of the alien one. The heralds repeated what was being said, and the guests waited to see what would happen. The unfortunate hamatsa was surrounded by a group of his fellows and thrust into the fire, although their acting was sufficiently good to make it appear that they were trying to check him. By these drastic means the hamatsa were able to add to the prestige of their society, though it is said that the a'alk leader expressed the opinion that the whole affair was a stupid blunder.

The Bella Coola were then long, long ago the usual outcome of friction between a'ult and hahaetc was the incorporation of members of the former society into the latter like any other uninitiated. The following account of an incident of this kind was obtained from a Kitsepti man who regarded it as historically accurate.

Some two hundred years after the first settlement of this earth, the members of the two societies used to live amicably together during the summer, which was not surprising considering that both consisted mostly of the same families. But during the winter the hahaetc all gathered to a village on the Dean River for their dances, while the a'ult also gathered at the same season to the village of Tsalalk, opposite the present Stanton Cannery below Kitsepti.[10] There was considerable jealousy between the two organizations, and the members were always seeking an opportunity to divide and subjugate their rivals. A Cannibal dance had been given by the hahaetc and the a'ult, who were present as uninitiated guests, had succeeded with wonder the disappearance of the performer into the mysterious cedar chest. But a few days later, Cannibalis, a chief and leader to one of the a'ult dances, happened to be in a lonely part of the forest where he was amused to meet the Cannibal. The latter, candidate of the supernatural power, spoke:

"In meeting me today you have not changed, you will soon be a corpse."

Cannibalis, a middle-aged man of powerful physique, was not impressed by the other's powers, whether physical or supernatural.

"Why," he answered, "it is you who have taken my trouble. You are old and feeble and if you try to injure me I will be the worse for you."

"My age has nothing to do with it," answered the Cannibal. "You have not not with me."

In this previous run of the Cannibal's supernatural competitors appeared, but Cannibalis still did not fear because they were both old and unarmed, whereas he had no one. But when two more hahaetc appeared,

[10] The Kitsepti informant stated that long ago a similar segregation of a'ult took place at Tsalalk and hahaetc took place at Bella Coola. Bella Coola informants have nothing of this. The migration of the uninitiated from Dean to Tsalalk further down are taking place tends to a division of the village, and it is most unlikely that two societies would have been created without definite reason. This would hardly account for a separation into two villages and no explanation for the movement is offered.

173 he heard nets alone, knowing that he alone was too great for him. The Cassiabal noticed that if this powerful man could be induced into their society he would be a source of strength, so he said:

375 376

"You are now an initiate of mine."

Kawambia understood that this meant he was to be initiated into the Barim society. He agreed, but asked to be permitted to complete the ritual dance which he was performing that evening, and to get holding sticks for which he had gone to the forest. The Cassiabal were only too willing to grant this dispensation in view of having a valuable recruit.

On his return to the village, Kawambia told his fellow ritual that he was going to be a Barim and they were greatly grieved at loss of their leader. That night they gave the dance which had been started and composed a song of which the theme was the way in which their chief had fallen until their heads were saddle down. The Cassiabal, realized in this way, heard that this was a prelude to further trouble with the ritual, but Kawambia duly carried out his promise and was enrolled as a Barim. Death of their leader, many of his fellow-dancers were admitted to Barim, and now also that time there has been absolutely little rivalry between the two societies. In the event the Cassiabal gave his dance with a song indicating how he had not a strange contract over others he had prevailed, this was, of course, the assistance Kawambia.

[illegible] To these two is attributed the origin of the practice of showing to decide priority of invitation giving. It is said that both Kawambia and the Cassiabal were anxious to invite the people to a ceremony on the same evening and agreed to dance against each other to decide which should have preference. Kawambia prevailed, and the Cassiabal duly postponed his dance and went with his followers to the winner's house.

[illegible] In fairness overall, course of the tribal dealing with the origin history of the society are of slight value. So far as they go, they agree with other evidence pointing to the gradual growth of the Barim society from a band of elders endowed with supernatural power to a society with everyone prestige, dominating the life of the community and entirely overshadowing the cult who seem once to have been their rivals.

(b) A musicing's [illegible] dancing used in s'ult songs describing the behavior [illegible].

(c) [illegible] who is said to have seen a Cowichan hunter when [illegible] the hunter was supposed to be in the land above. A song was composed about the incident, and the dance-drama has been remembered for many years. [illegible] see [illegible], p. [illegible].

[illegible] As already described, whenever a dancer is performing, the women wear a peculiar high-pitched drone and the hawkbill call and rattles suitable to the occasion. A phonograph record[1] was made of the drone, followed by a cry suitable for either round or s'ult dances. The following words are virtually sung:

[illegible] | [illegible] the [illegible], | [illegible] chiefs.

[792] (c) The meaning of this word is not known; it is considered to be quite distinct from the identical term in Chinook jargon for "dance."
(d) The meaning of the whole song is commonly obscure.

Marriage Songs

*633 As marriage songs, two distinct classes may be considered:
515 A. Those used at weddings;
[581] B. Shaming songs used in connection with divorce cases.
[577] The former are said to have been handed down from the ancient past and consist of a few almost meaningless words. The latter are composed whenever required, and consist of foul allusions to the person being ridiculed.

Wedding Songs

[775] (b) Qulaqua came down with xayqayat in the beginning of time, and brought, as a gift from Alqaxmen, the prerogative of dancing at weddings. He landed at Kumaqnit, and an explanation is given by the Bella Coola for the use of this song by the people of there.

[424] (c) A reference to a marriage among the first people on earth. One of Qulaqua's companions married a woman whose relatives had brought light with them from above.

(d) Kamala came down from above with ayayayat in the beginning of time, he had the prerogative of dancing at weddings. 533*
(e) Kamala likewise came down with ayayayat, bringing the same prerogative as Kamala. 515
(f) The rest of this song has been forgotten. [779] [424]

Fragmentary and short as are these songs, they are more elaborate than many used at weddings. These frequently contain no words, merely an ancient tune accompanied by humming and meaningless choral interjections.*

DANCING SONGS

533*
Songs of this type are sung by the singers while the principal performer dances; in this respect, they resemble kamala compositions and differ entirely from the abbreviated and individualistic wedding songs. Though used primarily to shame a runaway husband or wife, one is sometimes employed on other occasions. 516 571 [315]

C The third part of this song has been forgotten.

(c) This word means "The one (feminine) with the very hairy pubends." The woman in question had run away from her husband and the sickness was confined at this dancing Kwakiutlan rite. [551] [552]

Two examples of such wedding songs were collected. They are song VII D 2a, National Museum of Canada, singer, Jim Pelkey, and song VII D 2c, National Museum of Canada, singer, Louie Charlie.

(f) This repetition merely adds force to the complaint of the aggrieved husband. It was impossible to obtain an accurate translation of such substitutes.

(g) Referring to all women in general.

(h) In this second part, the theme changes from the specific phrase of the aggrieved husband to his condemnation and criticism of the whole female sex. Such conclusions are common to dancing songs, and are often accompanied by a change of tune.

C The third part of this song has been forgotten.

(a) This song was sung by women to shame Nelkila who had deserted his wife to run the work of a business company, Tsawin.

(b) Recorded on song VIII D 10b, National Museum of Canada, singer, Jim Pulkeit.

(c) It was impossible to obtain translations of such substitutes.

(d) Any nickname is picked upon to a dancing song. Nelkila must have failed to perform deeds of any kind, and the feminine members chose to decide him for this reason of his faithlessness.

(e) It was impossible to obtain translations of such substitutes.

(f) Ellen was one of the regular Kwagutl singers who had shown special spirit both in the insertion of obscene sex motives in songs used by men to decide faithless women. The women apparently considered this a good opportunity to voice their general disapproval by coupling his name with that of Nelkila. Ellen had suffered a broken arm when fighting and it had been badly set.

(c) It is said that women, even of slave blood, used to endeavour to increase their importance in the eyes of their children by boasting, falsely, of concerned lovers. [554]

(d) A term of opprobrium, difficult to translate. It is said to imply slave ancestry, but is more probably a mere epithet, referring to the female organs. [195]

(e) This is addressed to women in general. [193]

(f) An expression of pain or sorrow, used under all circumstances. [192]

(g) The theme is here changed as if it were [illegible] herself speaking. This is a common device in all kinds of songs.

(h) [illegible] was supposed to be the father of [illegible]'s child.

Mourning Songs

Mourning songs excel all other Bella Coola compositions in length, complexity, and wealth of detail. Especially those composed for mighty chiefs contain numerous references to the ancestral history of the deceased and mention incidents referred to in origin myths, a source of pride to the survivors and of envy to those who listen. 533* [765] [764]

CHAPTER III

WARFARE[1]

General Observations — Specific Accounts

General Observations

721 648 PRIOR to the establishment of British rule, there was considerable warfare among the coastal tribes of British Columbia. Long-continued struggles leading to the extermination of one or other of the participants were unknown, but there were constant raids, counter-raids, forays, and attacks. These were never as continuous as on the Plains, where martial achievements were regarded more highly than on the coast, but it appears probable that at least several villages of the Bella Coola were embroiled every few years. Nevertheless, [794] war was secondary in importance to ceremonial rites. During the winter, peace reigned and members of hostile tribes were [556] even received as guests at some dances. At potlatches they might be subjected to insult, later to be avenged in the same manner or by active hostility, but seldom was actual violence offered either to envoys or guests. The symbol of peace and 726 friendliness was eagle down; the occupants of a canoe who 825 bore an invitation to a potlatch, or who were guests them- 778 selves, used to blow this substance up into the air whenever [484] another craft approached, and it was incumbent on the latter [578] to veer over to the other side of the channel. Eagle down was [677] considered to be so sacred that when two men were quarrelling a chief could stop them by blowing some of it over their heads.

721 In winter, hostilities were prevented by ceremonies, and in summer the people were usually busy laying in supplies of food; consequently, it was only in the late spring that fighting was [576] at all common. Even then the dictates of ceremonial life were [622] not entirely forgotten; no Indian novice went to war and in former times. Sklus might almost be called the Bella Coola national game, although it is now (1923) seldom played. 526 [172]

A game with somewhat similar rules is squdsiat, played with small wooden spears tipped with bone. When a number of men or boys decide to play, they choose two captains who in turn select their teams; any number can take part, provided that the sides are equal, but five each is usual. There is a special name for each player according to his position, and he bets against the corresponding member of the other team. A mark is set up, and one of the captains throws his spear, so that it will stick upright in the ground as near the target as possible. The rival leader endeavours to beat this, and if he fails, his second man throws, and each in succession until one comes closer to the goal than the rival captain. Then the latter's number two tries to beat the last thrower, followed by those on his own side until one succeeds or till all have thrown. The game thus ends when all of one side have thrown unsuccessfully. The winning side is, of course, the one to which belongs the player whose throw is nearest the target. Each member of the losing team pays his wager to his adversary and a second round is begun. 526 525

The sport is now rarely indulged in, but in former times games used to continue all day, and valuables were lost in the gambling which was considered to be a necessary part of it. Men used to observe ceremonial chastity to increase their chances of success and the expert was regarded with admiration by younger lads. The crack team of a village often used to visit other towns to compete against their representatives, and the games were centered amid frenzied excitement on the part of the supporters. This occasionally led to serious fighting. [785] [354] [628] [578]

Another sport of a similar type is archery; a mark is set up and each competitor tries to lodge his arrow as close to it as possible. This game has now entirely lost favour, the young men preferring a type of football played without strict attention to rules, but with great energy. 526

Bella Coola children, too, have their games and recreations, many of them of an imitative nature. Little boys enjoy nothing 857

Coola say that the return of the dead "washes away grief," and unquestionably it has a comforting effect on the mind of the donor of the potlatch. 552* 769

(3) Wealth. Unless a man has the necessary goods with which to make presents he cannot invite guests, no matter how important may be his ancestral myths and names. Some of this wealth he may be able to amass by his own labours, but unless he is assisted by his wife's family it is virtually impossible for him to succeed. The Bella Coola believe that a man cannot become a chief except through large payments made by a woman's family when they "rebuy" her from her husband. In other words, no man can succeed without the support of his wife. In choosing a mate a man is guided almost entirely by the ability of her family to give him financial support. In some cases an elderly couple assist a married son to give a potlatch; this custom, though considered quite proper, is not common. 476 552* 602 [578] [622] [581]

(4) Supernatural assistance. To the Bella Coola this is quite as important as the preceding. One man may work very hard but his efforts are never crowned with success, whereas another man will prosper in every venture. This is due to the supernatural attributes given by the supreme god to the latter. By prayer, ceremonial chastity, and other means, a man may increase the powers granted to him, but if these are entirely lacking, he can never hope to rise to the position of chief. 556* 787

PRELIMINARIES

In describing the potlatch, it will be convenient to refer to the donor as X, and assume him to be a middle-aged member of the nuxul society, whose seat and name, though duly ratified, lack importance through his previous failure to give large presents. 556*

For a number of years X has prospered. He has amassed quantities of skins, blankets, tools, copper ornaments, clothing, canoes, baskets, dentalium shell, slaves, and other valuables.

bear on the wall of his house, or an ancestral name. The speaker always recounts the whole myth before announcing which portion of it is transmitted to X as a prerogative. It is understood that this transference will be duly validated by presents to X when he gives his potlatch. Such are termed dzémémemtsem and signify the repurchase of a wife from her husband. Though this is known to be a fiction it has extreme social importance. Unless dzémémemtsem is paid there is an ineradicable blot upon the children; in fact, it is one of the essentials of a legal marriage. All prerogatives thus transferred on xlástsem become the property of X and will in time pass to his children, unless recalled to the wife's family by further repurchase (dzémémemtsem) money or goods. In this fashion elements of family myths become scattered, and one of the considerations in choosing a wife is to select a woman able to bring back some missing part of the husband's myth. 556* 425 583 [581]

The usual present is an ancestral name, which X henceforth uses as potlatches as his most distinguished title, though the myth in which it is incorporated does not belong to him. As long as the name remains in X's family those who originally owned it are unable to make use of it. Such a name is said to be "dragged across" by the wife to her husband, the immense weight or importance of the designation being compared with the dragging of a heavy log. Occasionally, the father of a married woman, animated by the kindliest feelings towards his son-in-law, may give him outright a myth with all the names embodied therein. This can happen only where there are no other survivors of the family. In such a case when the myth is recounted it must always be mentioned how it has been obtained. The number and type of the prerogatives transferred depend upon the sentiments with which his wife's family regard X. If, in addition to being a worthy man, he is member of their ancestral family, or of one with which his wife's has frequently intermarried, so that in course of generations prerogatives have intermingled, there is less objection to giving him such rights than if he were an unrelated individual. * 539 brothers have the right, moreover, to hunt and collect food in the places 424 used by these first ancestors. The areas so authorized are:

Ätwulsqōmus: the mountain where they first came to earth.

Okqomēy: a valley leading into the main valley of the Kimsquit River where Omqomkilkle was accustomed to hunt.

Ïulqā-kil: a valley where Smasaw's wives used to pick berries.

Iqumk: a level tract of country on the bank of the Kimsquit River twenty-eight miles from its mouth. No people landed here and Smasaw pre-empted it as a hunting-ground.

Nulqa-kul: another valley where Smasaw's wives used to pick berries.

The place in the Kimsquit River where their salmon-weir was erected, and the spot where they caught olachen.

538 The length and wealth of detail embodied in this myth raises the 115 question of whether it is one of the usual type, or represents a combination of several stories strung together and related by a man eager to glorify the traditions of his own ancestors. It was received from Jim Pollard, a Kimsquit Indian, descended from Smasaw, and himself the user of this name, a valuable and reliable informant. Jim is a man of great ability, who has given more potlatches than any other Indian of either Bella Coola or Kimsquit, and who, accordingly, has been able to validate very fully his ancestral myths and the names embodied therein. Owing to the deaths of his relatives, Jim has been able to use designations and portions of this legend which otherwise would certainly have belonged to other people. In this respect it, therefore, represents an amalgamation, but one of a legitimate nature. Theoretically, every myth would be com-
[424] plete if it were not for the parts possessed by others, and the aim of every [581] wise Bella Coola is to seek the return of these pieces by judicious marriage. Jim has been able to achieve this by the death of his relatives and the assistance of his wife, herself a descendant of Smasaw. Before the coming of the white man and the consequent dwindling of population, it is unlikely that any one person would have the duly validated right to tell a myth of this length, but theoretically it was possible, and might have been done by anyone as superior to his fellows as this man is to the present inhabitants of Kimsquit.

the most human of all substances, and, therefore, a potent 836 protection against supernatural beings. It is valuable as a 841 defence against evil monsters, but it is equally deadly to 789 shamans and other human beings with supernatural powers.
In the distant past, Raven taught mankind that to sleep with a 834 menstruating woman would so blind a man that he would be 841 unsuccessful in hunting. The belief is that animals, knowing everything that takes place, avoid one who is so unclean. One [773] old man mentioned that he had failed to obey this injunction [825] and considered his loss of virility as a punishment, overlooking the fact that he was over seventy years of age.

The coming of adolescence in a boy is recognized by change 881 in voice and the other usual indications. He is neither taboo nor unclean, and consequently does not have to undergo any restrictions on his actions. There is no ceremony to mark the entry of a youth into adult membership of the tribe; instead, this comes gradually and puberty is no more than an indication of increasing age and strength.

Marriage

Like most so-called "primitive" peoples, the Bella Coola 571 regard the married state as the normal condition of man. 589 Anyone unwilling to wed is considered unnatural. Since the number of the sexes is approximately equal, the only persons [735] forced to live alone are elderly widows and widowers, and those crippled, either mentally or physically. Such individuals are looked upon as unfortunate; in fact, they have failed in one of the most fundamental of life's struggles. Men provides fish 581 and game, builds houses and canoes, while women collects berries, makes baskets, cooks, and performs the multitudinous [462] small household tasks.

"Is it not to the benefit of each to marry?" say the Bella Coola.

Marriage is not a mere economic arrangement, nor is its sole function to regulate relations between the sexes. Its most [858] important feature is that it governs the status of the child.

Confidently believing that he has descended from ancestors who came to this earth in the beginning of time, a Bella Coola wishes to have his children firmly established in the path of his forbears. This can be accomplished only with the aid of a suitable mother. It follows that marriage is not primarily a matter of affection, but of the ancestral eligibility of the contracting parties.

CHOICE OF MATE

Since the initiative for marriage is taken by the man in almost all cases, it will be convenient and proper to describe the factors which enter into the search for a wife, remembering that the concerns govern the decision of the woman and her relatives. The choice of the woman who is to be the mother of the children who will carry on the traditions of the ancestral family is a matter of too great importance to be entrusted to any young person. Accordingly, while their son is yet a child, his parents often discuss who would be a suitable wife for him. They view the matter from a strictly business standpoint. Proud of their own ancient lineage, they would not demean themselves by allowing their son to marry a girl who could not trace her ancestry back to the first people, or with one whose forbears had disgraced themselves by marriage with slaves. Instead, it is a matter of pride for parents to have a daughter-in-law the child of a powerful chief. Nor can they choose a woman too closely related to their son. Marriage with a sister, an aunt, a niece, or any first cousin is strictly prohibited. No reason for these laws could be obtained; the Bella Coola consider that it would be "indecent" or unclean so to marry, but have theorized no further about the matter. An adopted child is regarded in the same light as an own child. The Bella Coola know, and are amused by, the regulation of marriage according to totem among the northern tribes, but practise nothing of the same nature themselves. In fact, marriages usually take place among those who are descended from one ancestor and who have, accordingly, the same crest, though the significance of the sons is very different from his son among the northern tribes.

Having eliminated those girls who are too closely related, or who are unwanted on account of the poverty of their parents, the father and mother can concentrate on others of about the same age as their son. The most desirable is a member of the extended family of one of the parents. This obviates the dangers and difficulties of marriage with a stranger, and any children will be born into the close-knit circle of related women stretching back to the beginning of time. They consider that such a child is fortunate, as if he were held close to the spiritual embrace of his powerful forefathers of antiquity. Each extended family is jealously proud of its ancient traditions and prerogatives, and as some of these are transmitted at marriage, it follows that a meeting within its ranks is desirable from a business standpoint. Moreover, it is recognized that the husband obtains more prestige than the wife on the wedding and that her relatives are more likely to be generous when their son-in-law is one in whom they are related. Indeed, some extended families are as "stingy," (to use the Dalu Creek expression), that for generations they have habitually married endogamously. In such cases it is not unknown for the children of first cousins to mate, though this is usually regarded as not quite proper. The most common marriages are between the grandchildren and great-grandchildren of first cousins, or between the child and grandchild of a first cousin when of suitable age. According to mythology, unions have sometimes taken place between brother and sister in order to preserve the traditions within the family, and it appears highly probable that marriages have occasionally occurred between first cousins, although no specific instances of this could be learned. As long as the laws against incest are observed, any girl of appropriate age who is addressed as mamu (G, p. [illegible]) is a fit partner. Since extended families have usually become localized in certain villages, there is a strong leaning to local endogamy, though this is not compulsory. The restrictions

[illegible] marriage are of a bilateral nature, and the preferences are equally bilateral, with a tendency to become patrilineal, in accordance with the patrilineal tendency of the ancestral family as already described.

[illegible] Although these considerations greatly restrict the selection of a suitable daughter-in-law, a number of choices always remain. The parents of the prospective bridegroom consider the essential advantages of each of them. Since the ability of a man to give patrilineal depends largely on the wealth contributed by his wife's matrilineal family, wise parents choose a girl whose brothers are lazy. Moreover, they know that their son's children will receive prerogatives from their maternal grandparents, hence it is desirable to choose those who have prized their dowry, or other valuable rights. Personal names are not so important, because these are the personal property of all members of the ancestral family. A great consideration is the industriousness of the girl herself, though this is of less moment than the working ability of her father and brothers. Marriage was discussed with a very old man who had had four wives. After describing the idiosyncrasies of the four, he continued:

"My last wife was by far the best. Her family gave me many presents."

[illegible] Frequently the choice of a wife is simplified by an institution which may be termed "return marriage." If, for example, a few generations ago a widow was married into another ancestral family, or into a distant branch of her own, it was considered proper for a man of her family to receive as wife a woman of the family into which she had married. During the previous wedding then the women's family bestowed much wealth and valuable prerogatives. It is proper that the latter should be returned to the ancestral family of their owners. A return marriage also binds two families together, with consequent strength to the children. A few examples will make the matter clear.

[illegible] as possible, though one now is considered highly desirable. The sentiment is thus clearly described: the more closely the parents are bound together by ties of common ancestry, the greater will be their children's commercial strength. Further, endogamous alliances of this type obviate all danger of feuds, since return marriages are not required.

[illegible] In recent years it has become fashionable, or socially "smart," with some Bella Coola families to seek wives from outlying coastal fishing, and even from other tribes. It is said that this practice was initiated by Pashe, an important chief who died between 1870 and 1880. He sought foreign marriages on account of the prerogatives which were brought to dowry by his wives and considered that such rights, transmissible to his children, more than compensated for the lack of strength provided by shared ancestors. Many have followed his example, with the result that some ancestral families have entirely abandoned its endogamic tendency. Boas (p. 104) has made the same observation. Although this exogamic principle is directly contrary to that which has already been described, yet it should be noted that each has the same emphasis—the search for a wife able to bring most to her as our ordinary children.

[illegible] Should the parents consider a foreign woman as wife for their son, then her worth is discussed from every angle. One woman may have the right to good hunting grounds, the family of another may have some valuable social prerogatives, a third some hunter-rite. Anxious thought is put on the relative values of these. Her mate had heard of the French system of dot, and emphasizes strongly how far superior to, and more sensible is it than to Canadian practice. In recent years the younger Bella Coola have been arranging their own marriages, and the elder are honest enough that they are influenced only by the beauty and working ability of the girl, not by her real worth, the prerogatives which she can bring to her children.

[illegible] Although parents consider chiefly the ancestry of their future daughter-in-law, yet they are not entirely oblivious to the girl herself. She must be of about the same age as their son, preferably a year or two older. Should the wife be the younger, it is thought that she ages rapidly until she appears as old as her husband. Boys usually marry at seventeen or eighteen, and it is essential that the women chosen for wife must have been secluded for at least a year following puberty. Not a wealthy girl chosen, or one of notoriously bad temper. As their son reaches the age of marriage, his parents usually consult him, though it is not usual for him to privately their wishes. A girl who has been leading a notoriously bad life is not desired, though this is more unusual for the daughter of a chief. The feeling is that such a girl would be a faithless and fickle wife, rather than any objection to her sin as such.

Realizing the importance of marriage, the parents of a boy discuss and plan the event for years, weighing the relative value of girls whom they think they could choose for their son. By the time he has reached the age of fourteen or fifteen, they have decided on the most suitable partner, and it then becomes necessary to consult her parents and win their approval.

PROCEDURE OF ENGAGEMENT

When the parents of the young man (whom it will be convenient to name X) have at last decided on a suitable partner, they must choose an intermediary for the first proposal. In all these discussions the elderly relatives of the parents take a leading part, and especially their own parents if alive. Sometimes X's father himself interviews the father of the girl (here termed Y), at other times he asks some friend to do so. The matter is not supposed to be generally known, and the intermediary goes to Y's father's house, and quietly tells her parents that X's family would like their daughter to become X's wife. This preliminary asking is done unceremoniously, at any time and in any place, and the messenger withdraws after giving his message. In all probability Y's family have already re-

[illegible] ceived information of the proposed marriage, but they always plead ignorance, and deliberate for several days. Y's parents and other relatives take part in the discussion, and Y herself may likewise be taken into confidence. Although a daughter has, theoretically, little choice, in practice she exercises a great deal of influence. The mother and father weigh the suitor's eligibility not only with regard to wealth and ancestral pretensions, but consider his character. An immoral young man is not desirable, though neither is one who is impotent.

If Y's relatives agree to the proposal, some one of them informs the intermediary, or X's father, and the young people are considered to be engaged. The fact is supposed to be kept secret for several days, although the news usually becomes known sooner. X's relatives as soon as possible take a number of presents to Y's family. These are given in private, and are termed "secret gifts"; they are said to give strength to the future children. Since no witnesses are present it follows that no social prestige accrues from the transaction. The relatives included in the "family" of either X or Y are not always the same; uncles, aunts, grandparents, may or may not take part in the giving and receiving of presents, the parents alone always do so. Sometimes distant relatives take a leading part in the arrangements, either in hope of receiving valuable gifts, or of obtaining social influence by lavish giving. If Y's relatives have reason to believe that Y's family will accept their proposal, several of them may go in company and actually carry the "secret gifts" to Y's house at the time of making the first proposal. Should this be rejected, they merely carry away their goods, and as the affair has been private, no one's vanity is hurt.

The acceptance of "secret gifts" binds the engagement of X and Y, but a few days elapse before this is made public. If Y's family is wealthy, his father, or other near relative, personally invites all the inhabitants of the village to his house. The singers, in their usual sections behind the fire, strike up the tune of some burial and the owner of the song, then warned,

If a grandchild be born they will give him a certain name if a boy, and another if a girl, so that henceforth no one can take that title for himself, even though it is not in use. As already mentioned, even when a name has duly passed to one of the children, it can be recalled in future generations by a return marriage. The maintenance of names, or the providing of them for children yet unborn, is perhaps the most binding factor of the whole marriage rite. Mythology contains incidents to which names, and other prerogatives, have been given away outright. Cases are cited by the Bella Coola where a father has given hunting-grounds as "food" for the use of the relatives of his son- or daughter-in-law, but it is usual merely to promise the use of them to the grandchildren.

Since the maintenance of names, or other prerogatives, is the foundation stone of Bella Coola marriages, it is necessary to digress still further in an attempt to analyze the concepts at the base of the connection. If the contracting parties are members of different unrelated families, or even of different branches of the same family, there is a feeling of strain and unpleasantness at the intimate relations into which they are brought. There is a conflict of desires. On one hand is the wish to keep the family prerogatives from going astray, on the other, a wish that they should go astray so as to give the required for the bride or bridegroom. If children result, the matter is simple, since they are equally members of the unrelated families of mother and father and form a bond which draws the two social units into the closer community of interest. Future marriages will then be sought by successive generations, until the prerogatives of the two families become so closely interwoven that a child will, indeed, be born into the midst of related ancestors from both parents. But when there are no children, the matter is complicated, since the recipients of names are unnecessarily try to keep them entirely. They must do so with the best intentions, feeling that it would be a slight to the donors to give them back. Bella Coola etiquette is not sufficiently exact to stipulate when should be done. If the [illegible] is not concerned, the donors may be offended at its being kept; if it is concerned, they may be offended that it has not been kept.

The following examples will help to explain this rather complex point.

[illegible]

[illegible] one of his family relatives was murdered in Kimanjo. The deceased was never detected, but most of the Mella Chila believe that it was done by one of Omanyi's relatives, and that the deceased's name was quite sufficient to furnish an excuse for the deed.

It is hoped that these two instances will serve to emphasize why the Mella Chila prefer marriages within the ranks of the ancestral family. When this other place, women are usually given outsights, and are merely presented for the use of the lower children.

[illegible] After this digression, to return to the marriage of X and Y. The ceremony is taking place in the house of Y's father, and the parents of each participant have expounded parts of their origin myths, and provided names for the resultant children.

Then Y's relatives give numerous presents to X's family, in each case including those who are exercising themselves with the contract. Cattle, sheep, blankets, and other articles of great worth are given; they are said to be "bird covering" for X. The greater their value, the greater her prestige. Her father calls a Boran chief to address the assemblage, speaking as though he were Y. He says to others:

"My father, my mother, my brothers, my uncles, and their associates have given me my bird covering."

These presents are the binding factors of the wedding. They are said to bind the girl to her husband's house, and accordingly are sometimes called, "rope dowerage." This is only done when a woman is married for the first time.

Another woman now holds forth on behalf of Y's father:

"What we do today is no small matter. We have done today what was done in former times, and what shall be done in the future."

[177]

dus boast that she has three sons of such, but as the practice has not found favour in Bella Coola, it is little to her advantage.[1]

[556]

These complicated marriage rites are necessary to satisfy the pride of the two families in their origin myths, and the need to establish the resultant children in the paths of their ancestors. Among slaves or others who lack ancestral prerogatives, marriage is an affair of slight worth. Such persons simply live together with little ceremony, though they always try to give at least a feast so that there may be witnesses of the transaction. It is immaterial whether or not they marry their own relatives, since no ancestral prerogatives are to be transmitted.

[527]

MARRIAGE LIFE

Y usually lives in the house of X's father, though economic circumstances may compel her husband to live in her home. If the parents are very wealthy, a house may be built for the young people, but usually their home is one of the bedrooms in the house of X's father; this particular residence expects Y not only to good advice from her mother-in-law, but often to caustic criticism. The marital life of X and Y does not differ materially from that of other young couples in any part of the world, and is accordingly difficult to describe. Although love rarely enters into the original choice of a mate, a serviceable substitute is found in the mutual respect for each other's ancestry, and the knowledge of the importance of the rites performed with the aid of each other's elderly relatives. The young people realize that marriage affects the families of both, and accordingly accept it as a matter of course. The Bella Coola are fond of children. Their birth is a matter of sincere rejoicing, partly because it binds the two families more closely together, but parental affection is one of the strongest Bella Coola characteristics. The parents usually spoil their children; infants, especially, are never chastised and rarely blessing" for the child. The advantages to the donors were that they had an opportunity of showing their dignity, and it would always be a mark of pride for the child to be able to boast of the way in which she had been "sold."

Commercial marriage clearly demonstrates two strong Bella Coola characteristics; namely, the desire publicly to enter into financial undertakings to demonstrate the wealth of the contracting party, and the desire to increase the prestige of children by means of this wealth expended indirectly on their behalf.

EXTRA-MARITAL RELATIONS

Although the Bella Coola do not regard marriage primarily as a means of regulating relations between the sexes, yet the connection between the two is sufficiently close to warrant description in this chapter. A man considers intercourse as one of the normal phenomena of life: by marrying he has exclusive rights to his wife, but her moral restraints deter him from anyone else to whom he can gain access without infringing the prerogatives of some other husband. Moreover, sexual intercourse is not regarded solely as a gratification of desires; it has a significance which can be described, not tragically, as holy. As already explained, one favourite methods of obtaining success in any undertaking are by preserving lengthy continence or by observing ceremonial chastity. If a young ceremonial man or widower should wish to make use of this latter means, he is compelled to have relations with a woman to whom he has no just claims. This is universally recognized, nor is there the slightest odium attached to the man. The only essential is that he neither violate another's wife, nor force a young girl against her will.

In the present time there is great laxity in Bella Coola, a condition which makes it difficult to judge the extent of adultery in former times. Every effort was made to obtain satisfactory evidence, and the following was verified and re-verified with the elder men.

A wife, properly married with full ceremony, was usually [illegible] elder relatives were removed, not only as entire members of the ancestral family, but as those most familiar with myths and other cherished possessions. With the spread of new ideas, the young people no longer respect the loss of their elders, and consequently do not heed their admonitions and advice. Theoretically, such self-reliance would seem desirable, but in practice it has led to unfortunate results. A young man, considering himself superior to the older people, glories in acting on his own initiative, but too often he lacks the requisite strength of character to guide his own life. If he wishes to drink, he does so. If he desires to marry, he chooses his mate without considering the transmission of ancestral rights which entitled [illegible] to former times. If he tires of his wife, he deserts her for another. If he chooses to steal, he is no longer restrained by relatives who fear disgrace. The elders, incapable of assuming the role, watch sadly and ask seriously whether the coming of the white man has brought compensation for the loss it has caused. It is deplorable that the emancipation of the younger men and women has taken place before the development of the sense of individual responsibility and conscience which public opinion formerly rendered less necessary. Christianity provides a moral code for those who are fully convinced, but for the many in the transition stage, the break-down of the old system of family influence has been tragic.

Profound religious beliefs and lack of individual initiative are shared by all Bella Coola with the exception, perhaps, of a few of the younger people who, having been educated in white man's schools, have adopted the new outlook unconditionally. In most characteristics they display as wide variability as any other people. In institutions, for example, they range from one extreme to the other. As the writer became familiar with the elder men, he found it possible to recognize without difficulty the strength of some and the weakness of others. There are few, but they can be easily detected owing to their lack of forceps. It is a pleasure to record the reliability of the author's friends and informants. Their veracity was checked repeat-

to their forefathers. Profound as these material changes have been, those of a psychological nature have been even more important. New worlds have been thrown open to them, stimulating ideas have been brought to their attention, and they have realized for the first time that the world is infinitely larger than they had imagined. Hand in hand with this extension of knowledge has gone disbelief in their own ancient lore. The white man, whose superiority and mechanical skill dazzle them, positively denies the actuality of their mythology, and laughs at the dramatic performances which were wont to fill the winter with engrossing interest. Such rites can flourish only in an atmosphere of profound belief. He has been so shaken that the dances continue listlessly, a mere shadow of a once living art. The young people were the first to embrace a scepticism that has rapidly grown into disbelief of the faith of their ancestors, and a half-concealed scorn for their elders, the upholders of the old customs. Worse of all, prohibition of the potlatch has made it impossible for a man to reach a position of social eminence. Moreover, since the holding of any rank of ceremonial requires a distribution of gifts, formal gatherings of all kinds have become virtually impossible; even marriages have no longer the social support that formerly made them so lasting.

These cumulative blows would be enough to shake any civilization, and that of the Bella Coola has been entirely unable to adjust itself to the new conditions. The young people, having lost respect for their elders, are deprived of the advice and support essential to the continuity of culture. They see the white man's power, they want his mechanical devices, but have failed to assimilate them. For example, a gramophone in a Bella Coola house is an anachronism, which several similar articles and the old picture but do not provide a new one. Desiring to copy the new ways thrown open to them, they have adopted the outward show but not the substance, and in so doing have discarded their own culture. In the old days they were ambitious to hold potlatches and willing to work steadily towards that goal; now, new desires have not kept pace with

(s) Awatqwa-xtl, "Labreted": the eastern continuation of the last mentioned.* The name is explained as follows: 361

One of the people who came to the earth in the beginning of time, Taiatwala by name, travelled to the Skeena River, and there saw women wearing labrets. On his return to Bella Coola he settled at Awatqwa-xtl and carved on his totem-pole* the figure of a woman with an abalone-shell labret as a memorial of his voyage. Visitors coming to his potlatches named the town from this figure. [173]

This was one of the largest towns in the valley.

*(t) Aimd-ts: a small town to the north of the last, not far from the Pe-xyh. It is assumed that it was founded by a descendant of Taiatwala named Aimd-ts. The consensus of opinion is that it has not been occupied for many years, but one informant recently dug up a clay pipe on the alleged site. [172]

*(u) Skhiitl, "What Has Been Divided": on the south shore of the Bella Coola River about a quarter of a mile from the sea. This village was founded by a certain Xyll.

*(v) Qwaqa-ts, meaning doubtful, perhaps "Salty": this, the most populous village of the valley in the recent past, is still inhabited by one or two families. The inhabitants of other towns explain its large population by marriages with slaves. This is the upper, or eastern, continuation of the preceding, and the two in combination formed a row of houses stretching for three-quarters of a mile (see Plate 9). [162] [172] [567]

(w) Gwaqdqwaq, "The Treeless Place": on the north side of the Bella Coola, supposedly about half a mile above Aimd-ts. This village was long ago deserted.

*Several towns, each consisting of a single row of houses, are regarded as forming one village. In such cases there is no visible boundary mark.

*The Bella Coola believe that their early ancestors used totem-poles, regarded adhesive to stand will be made, even though the work of Barbeau and others on the totem origin of totem-poles on the North-West Coast indicates that the Bella Coola example are not historically accurate. [771]

424 nearest answer to the question replied that his crest was the 979 Raven. The Kitkatla was a Raven man, too, and to the 825 narrator's surprise, treated him as a brother for the rest of his stay in Victoria. He shook with laughter as he recalled the experience, and added that though he was quite willing to accept favours of this kind he would never dream of returning them. It can be stated unhesitatingly that the Bella Coola have no totemic beliefs concerning their crests. There is not [582] the slightest trace of respect towards the animal, nor yet of exogamy.

211 Although crests are not objects of religious veneration, yet
424 they have some importance in the realm of social life. The 993 portrayal of one serves to indicate ownership of an ancestral myth describing that particular bird or animal. A wealthy 825 chief is proud to display his crest on a totem-pole, or as a painting on the front wall of his house. Anyone seeing such a [532] design is impressed with the glories of the family history of [556] the owner, to the latter's gratification. A living specimen of [304] the bird or animal is treated with no respect, but its delineation is a memento of family history. For that reason a man is often tattooed* with his crest, that derived from his father's first ancestor on the right breast, that from his mother, on the left; and the owner of a canoe often carves his crest on its bow. After the death of a chief a memorial-post is erected near his grave, decorated with a painting or carving of one or more crests to remind observers not only of the deceased, but of his 000 family history, his most treasured possession. It is said, half

[171] [184] *It is said that tattooing was formerly customary not only among all the coastal tribes but also the Carriers. Both Bella Coola men and women decorated themselves in this way, but the custom was not universal, and is said never to have been common. It is believed that Haida chiefs tattooed themselves in connection with potlatches; in Bella Coola this was not the case although the operation was performed within the back-room of the patient's house. Two methods were employed. The first was by puncturing the skin with a needle smeared with colouring material; the second and less common, by passing a string coated with the substance beneath the skin. The dye was obtained from river stones which were baked for a long time and then ground into a powder. This keeps indefinitely and can be made ready for use by mixing with water. As far as could be learnt, any skilled craftsman [386] might perform the operation.

614 773 A man may claim descent from as many as eight of these groups, that is, he may be a member of eight ancestral families. Some restrictive means must have been employed to limit the choice of marriage partners, otherwise a man's membership in ancestral families would have been far greater than it is. The explanation lies in the high regard with which the members of an ancestral family esteem the prerogatives they have received from their forbears. With the marriage of the first women, their brothers were called upon to share their rights, both practical in regard to hunting territory, and ceremonial with regard to dance prerogatives, with their sisters' children. Bella Coola mythology contains no references to unwillingness on the part of the first men to do this; in fact, their own children benefited equally from the marriages of their fathers with other women. But, say the Bella Coola, after these first marriages, necessarily exogamic, men realized that it would be foolish to allow their children to marry far afield and so diffuse valuable prerogatives. It was far wiser for a man to seek as future son-in-law a youth belonging to the same ancestral family as himself or his wife. Then any resultant children would come into this world provided by both parents with common relatives, so that the child would be, as they express it, "Held close and supported by a close circle of ancestors."

582 614 [773] Bella Coola logic does not explain how marriages could have been arranged in the early generations without violating the laws of incest. The endogamic principle displayed at that time, however, has been carried out until the present day, so that a man endeavours to arrange marriages for his children with members of the same ancestral family. One of the strongest Bella Coola desires is to "make good the path" for his offspring, and this can best be done when they are born amply provided with relatives of common ancestry. There is [769] no belief in the active participation of distant ancestors in the affairs of men, yet, though incapable of clear expression, the Bella Coola feel strongly that a child is born into the companionship of its deceased relatives back to the beginning of time.

NEA Bellacoola NEA

This endogamic principle will be described in greater detail in vol. I, chap. vii, but mention of it here has been necessary to explain the composition of the ancestral family. 582 [614]

In recent years there has been a tendency for some men to marry foreign women in order that they, or their children, might obtain new prerogatives. Thus a trend towards exogamy has arisen from the same reason which is supposed to have caused endogamy. The offspring of such marriages cannot enjoy the feeling of strength and comfort that comes from the membership of both parents in the same ancestral family, but some individuals have felt that this was offset by the gain of highly desirable foreign prerogatives. It is said that this practice was initiated by a certain Pudes, father of a man about sixty years old in 1913. White influence probably had nothing to do with this radical innovation, although its wide adoption has been made more easy by the establishment of peaceful conditions on the coast. [554] [177]

Strong as is the belief in a common ancestry, it is unlikely that this would have sufficed to hold together the members of the ancestral family, without some definite prerogatives. These are of two kinds: names and land. 614 554

The fundamental principle governing Bella Coola nomenclature is that each name must have originated in connection with some event of comparative importance. It is unthinkable to apply a casual designation to a child. At a person's death his name, or names, may be transmitted to a relative, and it is proper that the owner of a name should know when, by whom, and for what reason, it was first created. Tradition affirms that, before coming to this earth, the first people were all given designations by Alpuntáw; these have been carefully handed down and are still in use. One name cannot be given to two individuals; instances occur of two people having the same one, but in such cases they have different origins. One person may have several names of different kinds, each carrying 551 [768] [553] [773] [428] fan in public opinion which expresses contempt for a lazy man who is constantly begging.

To anyone familiar with the definite social groupings of a tribe divided into clans or land-owning families, the ancestral family of the Bella Coola must appear as a vague and unreal unit, only distinguished by its intangibility. So it was found when investigating in the field. When information began to accumulate, it seemed as if there must be some definite obligations incumbent upon all members of the ancestral family, but none could be found. Without asking a direct question, the point was raised whether, if a man were killed, the members of his ancestral family would unite to avenge him. Conversely, were they liable for the deeds of any member? In each case the reply was in the negative; these matters concern only the immediate family. In regulating marriage the ancestral family is important, since it is wise for a man or woman to seek his mate within the members of that group, though it is not compulsory. Theoretically, the terms of kinship applied to members of the immediate family may be extended to members of the ancestral family, but in practice this is rarely the case, and, if so, is functionless. It might be argued that this somewhat wide application of kinship terms, verging on the classificatory usage, is a relic of an earlier, and now broken-down, clan system. It is impossible to prove or to deny such a contention. When trying to discover whether the members of an ancestral family ever contributed to a potlatch whereby one of their fellows established himself as a chief, the following interesting comment was received. The previous winter the informant had been in Bella Bella, and there the point was raised by a Bella Bella chief whom he quoted as follows:

"We laugh at you Bella Coola because each of you is always trying to be chief. Our system is much better; we all help our chiefs."

The man agreed with the Bella Bella man that there was an important difference between the practices of the two tribes.

[619] [621] is a more obvious social grouping than the ancestral family, though it is of the latter that a man is most proud. The member of a small, unimportant village often describes himself as a native of a neighbouring, larger one when at a distance from his home, simply as a matter of convenience.

Even before the coming of the white man, village sites were abandoned and people took up their residence with friends or relatives elsewhere. In fact, mythology contains instances of such migrations at the very beginning of time. In cases of this [773] [34] kind, memory of the earlier home has been preserved for many generations, and may perhaps be the explanation of the many villages which are described as two, and which have two names. In the early days immigrants seem always to have been welcome; they added to the numerical strength of the village, and the original inhabitants enjoyed boasting to the newcomers of their descent from the first settlers. Since any group forced to abandon their own homes naturally moved to those of relatives, there is no difficulty in understanding the process by [538] which they continued to intermarry with their new neighbours. Thus two, or even more ancestral families, inhabiting one village tended to form a closely inter-related stock. In rare instances, two unrelated ancestral families may have become inhabitants of the same village, which would unquestionably lead to intermarriage.

In most cases the endogamic tendencies already described cause the village community to be largely members of one ancestral family. In addition there are always other occupants; strangers who have fled from their homes and sought [563] refuge among the Bella Coola; the offspring of illicit intercourse [567] with slaves; guests; foreigners, especially Carriers temporarily [554] resident in Bella Coola; and finally slaves, without status in the community. The real inhabitants, those whose power is firmly planted in the village, are the reputed descendants of the first group of settlers, and accordingly a relative coming to [553] dwell in a village usually endeavours to obtain a name from the origin myth of the ancestral family occupying it, and thus

[52] friends, a further cause for their preliminary ostracism. A [72] Bella Coola who had been enslaved and ransomed had to [73] undergo a cleansing ceremony to remove the taint of slavery before he could take part in the ceremonies of the community.
It was impossible to leave the details of this rite.

[2.24] A master had complete power over a slave, unaffected by the force of public opinion, since the affairs of a slave, being without relatives, were of no consequence to anyone. Accordingly, the lot of a slave depended on the character of his master, and on his own ability and industry. An industrious slave was valued; such an one would not be traded or sold except through dire necessity, and in course of years he became, so far as actual treatment was concerned, one of the family. Many masters gave their slaves social[*] dance prerogatives, expending large sums for the purpose. In such a case the slave might become an influential member of the community, though the fact that he was not free was never forgotten. On the other hand, a master had not the slightest compunction about beating a lazy slave, and could kill him if he so desired. None of the present Bella Coola has heard of such a case; it was considered more sensible to sell or give away an unsatisfactory slave. It was accepted as a matter of course that a master should provide his slaves with food and clothing, since everything produced or obtained by one belonged to him. A slave-owner had full rights to his female slaves, and unquestionably exercised them. The only restraints were the jealousy of his own wife, or wives, and the feeling that it was undignified for a free man to demean himself. It was impossible to learn with even approximate accuracy to what extent intercourse took place between masters and slaves. Probably not a great deal, though there was considerable freedom of relations between slave women and the young men of the community, unrestrained by the pride of chieftainship. When a slave had been faithful for a number of years and had
• [57] became almost a member of the family, his master would try

[424] [49]

[53]

*Social privileges (I, p. 180) were more rarely given.

to arrange his marriage with some female slave; once this had taken place, the actual treatment meted out to him differed only slightly from that shown to a member of the family. In former times it would probably have been difficult for a stranger to tell married slaves from the members of the Bella Coola community until he had been long enough in the country to understand more than appeared on the surface. 527 582

Marriages between Bella Coola men and slave women were not infrequent, while the partnerships between slave men and even the daughters of chiefs were not unknown. In such cases the status of the children depended on the performance of ceremonies to wash from them the stain of their slave blood. While the mother was still pregnant her husband would call guests, not only from his own village, but from foreign tribes as well. Presents were given, according to the wealth of the donor, often aided by his immediate family, to "wash the child." Such ceremonies would be repeated several times before birth, and again at their time. Bella Coola sentiment was that such presents gagged the recipients; they knew of the dishonourable ancestry of the child, but the receipt of gifts on his account had wiped away the disgrace. Such a child was able to inherit prerogatives from his mother's old home, duly validated in Bella Coola by valuables, and by his own lavish presents he could silence those who remembered the blot on his ancestry. Similar procedure was carried out if a free woman married a slave. Unless her husband were already owned by one of her family, the woman's father or brother would arrange to purchase him. Then, aided by him, they would give the same type of presents to clear the children from the taint of slavery. If this were not done, the children had only the status of slaves, though, born and brought up in Bella Coola and associating from infancy with their master's children, they were virtually considered members of the family. 431 567 [428]

"Washing the child," during pregnancy and at birth, sufficed to cover the taint on its history, but in later years if such a person failed to continue to give ceremonies, people would again talk of his slave ancestry. So, too, for the child or grand- [557] [578]

#534 headands and brows, were so angry at the interloper that they decided to raid Green Bay. Skáli's friend, however, heard of this plan and told his comrade. "All right," replied Skáli, "if they dare to do so I will show them my power. Of course you will have to accompany them, but when the attack is launched stay a short distance to one side. You will see for here."

Skáli now determined to return home. But the raiders, who were assembling at Kitwa, a point on the south side of North Bentinck Arm about a quarter mile from the head, had taken all the canoes, so the best Skáli's friend could obtain for him was the broken bow of a river canoe. In this frail craft he reached Ivacy, on the north side of North Bentinck Arm about one mile from the head, without difficulty, and there he took on the form of a black bear once more. In this guise he travelled so rapidly that he reached Green Bay long before the raiders.

Once more in human form, Skáli said to his parents, "A Bella Coola war party is on its way to attack us, because they are angry at the way I have avenged their women. Stay inside the house, and all will be well."

Before long the hostile canoes appeared in close formation near the beach. Skáli had dressed his bear blanket, over which he had strewed a large quantity of eagle down. He now shook himself. As Black Bear had promised, the down flew in all directions and those of the enemy on whom it lighted fell helpless to the bottom of their canoes, their arms, legs, heads, or bodies swollen beyond recognition. After a time Skáli called back the down, thus curing his victims. As he did so he told his father's herald to call out to the attackers that they must never again try to raid Green Bay. In spite of their discomfiture many of the Bella Coola rashly landed to press the assault, but Skáli clambered on to the roof of the house, from which point he struck them down with the death-dealing end of his bow. When the abortive attack had ended with the death of all those who had landed, Skáli's sister came to shore and requested him to restore his relatives to life. The two walked among the corpses, the friend pointing out his relations, whom Skáli revived with the life-giving end of his bow. Each of these brought back to life begged for a friend, which Skáli granted, until finally he had restored all those whom he had slain.

In their gratitude many of the Bella Coola brought Skáli to accept their daughters as wives. He took only one wife, but by this marriage friendly relations were established between Green Bay and Bella Coola, and ever since that time the people of the two places have intermarried and been on the best of terms.

Next morning they found a house to continue for them, a short distance from the lake; its name was Nanaqidaxa, and it had been erected for them by Alpaxsim who had selected this spot for their residence. It resembled other houses except that the door was in a back corner instead of in the middle of the front because bears must not approach the river, and the two will had some characteristics. The salmon would have been frightened if they had lived on one. The paintings on the back walls were of Kingfisher.

Chief from their forward Sawed downstream to the point where Swanee (I, p. 332) lived. Judging that someone was occupied above him, he set out to investigate. He met Tidlin and entered into conversation with him, finally asking if he, Swanee, might marry Tidlin's sister, Sainsim, "The Light Shower." Tidlin agreed, and the two were married in due course. At this ceremony a marriage song given by Alpaxsim was first used.*

Gyayyar and his brothers made a special kind of fish-trap, in which they caught large quantities of trout and sockeyed salmon, and below them Swanee and his family were also catching large quantities of salmon. The two settlements combined to give a potlatch. The brothers built an extension to the house to accommodate their guests, and when all were seated a representation of a black bear emerged from the room at the back of the house, imitating the appearance and actions of its ancestor when first they arrived on this earth. The artifacts brought by Gyayyar and his brothers from above were displayed to the guests, as has since been done on similar occasions by their descendants. At this potlatch the name Nakgalaix was given to Sainsim, having reference to the coloured house with the rear doorway.

Tidlin once sent his kingfisher Sawed up the river to discover whether or not there were people there, for at that time it was unknown country. He reported that there were, so Tidlin built a canoe, in the manner taught by Raven, and set off; en route he met the upstream settlers, who had likewise learnt the art of making canoes and were travelling downstream on an errand similar to his own.

The brothers used some of their wealth on one occasion to give a Sacior dance, at which they validated for Naqamalaix the Breaker (II, p. 133) name, Nanlomdilaix. This refers to the way in which he had flown with quivering wings when a kingfisher, and as he danced he shook his hands in imitation of this. This name had been given him by Alpaxsim, as had also his third, Gilgilwat, referring to his status as herald.

Swanee and Sainsim had many children who formed a band between

[illegible] GIVE UP *Sisaal'a

Soon after the Dean people had reached this earth Ayamim found that as they increased, they might spread about land scarce. Accordingly he sent down to Sisaal'a, on the Dean River thirty-five miles from the sea, three brothers, Ayamim, Gwayaxt, and Ldiitoax, a crane to serve as food for women, with their sister Sqajo'it. He gave the oldest brother instructions to divide the land among the different villages. Ayamim came in the guise of a mountain goat, but promptly sent his animal cloak back to the land above, before meeting downstream. To the inhabitants of each town he allotted certain valleys in the country to serve as hunting-grounds, and told the people that then, and only then, were to be their frontier. After reaching the coast, he travelled down Dean Inlet as far as the Bella Bella country, likewise allotting land to the different settlements, and marking each boundary with a stick. After finishing his task, Ayamim returned up the Dean River to his brothers. The three built a weir that spanned the river, and in it they caught so many small land salmon that the Carrier used to come from great distances to buy from them. Sqajo'it was married to a chief living on the lower part of the river, and her brothers, too, came below for their wives. Ayamim ultimately moved to Nooqhlo, on the east side of the Dean River, twenty-five miles from the sea.

Gwayaxt had come from above in the form of a deer. After taking off this cloak, he released it as an animal, which became the ancestor of all the deer near Kimsquit. They did not like Sisaal'a, where it was very cold, so they moved to Nikinik, on Dean Inlet, about three miles below Kimsquit, and there built their town. Unfortunately, the snowfall was so heavy that they had much trouble in lighting their fires; sometimes as much as ten feet of snow fell in a single night.

"Please, Ldiitoax," said the deer, "don't keep falling on us."

In the language of men, snow is ksi, and Ldiitoax means, "Copper One," but the language of deer is quite different. The snow, unmoved by their appeals, continued to fall, until at last the deer held a meeting and resolved to move away to the outer coast near Bella Bella, and never return again. They carried out this plan, and it is only within the last few years that some have come back, although for centuries some lived near Kimsquit.

[illegible] Ashiba[1]

In the beginning of time Ajaxmin sent down to Ashiba, Salmon House on the Dean River, Nashiba, his younger brother Tsagin, and their sister [illegible], "Sun," to search for a supernatural tree in the land above. Tsagin brought a cedar with him, and released it on earth.[2] With these people came to Ashiba, The Way of Heaven, who has created human form and guided them. Tsagin in turn moved about to the country of the Carrier Indians, where he constructed[3] taking the adopted name Sagin.

Nashiba, unprovided with a house or clothing, was so lonely and unhappy that for four days he fed hungry, naked and dependent, alone with his sister. Ajaxmin had promised to provide for his welfare, and, four days after Nashiba's landing, sent down the four supernatural carpenters to help him. Underneath an oven showed his dwelling spirit by building him a house, which was a replica of Heaven's tent. Nashiba asked the first carpenter, [illegible], to provide him with food, and the latter, obedient to Ajaxmin's instructions, whittled a cedar-bark salmon from maple wood and put it into the river. The fish came to life, swam, and jumped for a short time, but soon died. The carpenter tried several times with the same result. Then Raven appeared and gave him the form which every cedar-bark salmon has in the back of its neck. [illegible] put this form in one of his wooden models, and when he had thrown it in the river it swam strongly and survived. This fish multiplied so rapidly that Nashiba and his sister were able to suppose themselves on this kind of salmon, which have been plentiful in the Dean River ever since. [P.25]

After a time Nashiba decided to visit the people dwelling on the ocean. He asked [illegible] for a canoe, and the carpenter made him one in the form of an enormous sturgeon, that travelled without visible moving power. As dye time the Dean River disappeared beneath a huge boulder a short distance above the sea, but the craft shattered the rock and opened a channel.[4]

At the mouth of the Dean River Nashiba met Kimsan and married his sister Kitlan, using at this ceremony a wooden marriage ring given him by Ajaxmin. They had many children and ever since that time there have been intermarriages and friendly relations between the people of Salmon House and Kimsquit. [512]

At this juncture Smanu saw a party of strangers, and wondered who they might be as they crossed the river. There was great rejoicing when the two brothers told their parents who they were, for they had been so transformed that they were unrecognizable. At the time had said, Lélewate-a's three beautiful wives came rushing up, eager to have him take them back, but he paid no attention to them. He welcomed only the ugly one, who had mourned for him, and managed her until she became the most lovely of all.

Smanu, delighted at the safe return of his sons, and proud of Lélewate-a's beautiful children, sent invitations far and near to a great potlatch. At this ceremony he validated, with many presents, a name in the house for Lélewate-a. The name thus confirmed was Spitwáldi, "The First Born," a name given to Lélewate-a by Kapatlíqhe. Smanu also took this opportunity to confer names on his numerous grandchildren. After sojourning for some time in Kimsquit, the Kitlobe people returned home, richly laden with gifts.

In the course of time Wíxwéklaá bore her husband two more children. Smanu continued to prosper and to give potlatches, at one of which he gave one of his grandchildren the name Sóklwaq, "Chief." This designation at once became honourable on account of the goods expended. Lélewate-a did not wish to forget his Kitlobe friends, so in time he sent two of his children to live there. One of them was Sóklwaq, a name that has ever since remained there. Thus friendly relations between Kimsquit and Kitlobe, first opened by Lélewate-a, have been maintained. There have been many marriages between people of these two areas, each known of Lélewate-a, and it was only about one hundred and fifty years ago that a Kimsquit woman, Ásqwal by name, was married to a Kitlobe man to repay the original marriage of Wíxwéklaá. [548] [582]

When Smanu became old he gave yet another potlatch at which he took for himself the name Lélewéwat, "The Scatterer." He created this from his own fertile imagination, with reference to the way in which he scattered eagle down when first travelling to the north in eagle form. It has since been used by his descendants when old. [551]

539 * 424 [592]

The descendants of Smanu enjoy not only the prerogative of using this myth and the names included in it, but other privileges connected with it. If one of them gives a potlatch he carves the form of a mítqas on the spoons to be used at it, and paints the wall of his house with a whale design. Omqemlikha's descendants are more likely than others to receive supernatural good fortune from a mítqas. The descendants of both

[302] which are said to have been imported from the north in early [434] times. These marks serve to indicate the position of the girl, [789] who is both feared and respected, possessed of supernatural [536] power, and yet beautiful. Many Bella Coola myths describe how adolescent girls have been able to vanquish supernatural beings; perhaps the most striking of these is the manner in which they once saved mankind when the sun came too close to the earth. At the end of a year, or eleven months according to one old woman, the seclusion is terminated, and the girl resumes her normal activities. The first time she goes to the river she must throw on the water four pieces of dried, and four pieces of undyed cedar-bark. This is especially important if the salmon are running at the time, although no explanation of this ritual is given.

582 The resumption of her freedom indicates that a girl has 556 reached marriageable age. Chiefs sometimes confine their 882 daughters for even longer than a year, and usually delay their marriages for several years to demonstrate their importance; but this is not necessary, nor is it practised by other than wealthy individuals. It is not uncommon for a girl to wed before her year is out; in that case her restrictions automatically [554] lapse. Chiefs never allow such a curtailment for their daughters; to do so would diminish the prestige of the latter, and be detrimental to the status of their children when they marry 836 and have families. Illicit intercourse with a secluded adoles-
883 cent is considered not only illegal but disgusting as well. Be-[881] tween the period of confinement and marriage, intercourse is prohibited and guarded against by the parents of a girl, but is not considered filthy and seems to have been fairly common in former times with the daughters of poor people and slaves.
This sometimes took place before the first menstruation in spite of the disapproval with which this was regarded.

826 Although the menstrual blood which appears at the first

581 Confidently believing that he has descended from ancestors
[581] who came to this earth in the beginning of time, a Bella Coola wishes to have his children firmly established in the path of his forbears. This can be accomplished only with the aid of a suitable mother. It follows that marriage is not primarily a matter of affection, but of the ancestral eligibility of the contracting parties.

CHOICE OF MATE

564 Since the initiative for marriage is taken by the man in 581 almost all cases, it will be convenient and proper to describe the factors which enter into the search for a wife, remembering that the converse governs the decision of the woman and her relatives. The choice of the woman who is to be the mother of the children who will carry on the traditions of the ancestral family is a matter of too great importance to be entrusted to any young person. Accordingly, while their son is yet a child, his parents often discuss who would be a suitable wife for him. They view the matter from a strictly business standpoint.
581 Proud of their own ancient lineage, they would not demean themselves by allowing their son to marry a girl who could not trace her ancestry back to the first people, or with one whose forbears had disgraced themselves by marriage with slaves. Instead, it is a matter of pride for parents to have as daughter-in-law the child of a powerful chief. Nor can they choose a 582 woman too closely related to their son. Marriage with a sister, an aunt, a niece, or any first cousin is strictly prohibited. No reason for these laws could be obtained; the Bella Coola consider that it would be "indecent" or unclean so to marry, but have theorized no further about the matter. An adopted child
[597] is regarded in the same light as an own child. The Bella Coola
[829] know, and are amused by, the regulation of marriage according [171] to crests among the northern tribes, but practise nothing of the same nature themselves. In fact, marriages usually take place among those who are descended from one ancestor and who have, accordingly, the same crest, though the significance of the sons is very different from his son among the northern tribes.

Having eliminated those girls who are too closely related, or who are unsuited on account of the poverty of their parents, the father and mother can concentrate on others of about the same age as their son. The most desirable is a member of the ancestral family of one of the parents. This obviates the dangers and difficulties of marriage with a stranger, and any children will be born into the close-knit circle of related ancestors stretching back to the beginning of time. They consider that such a child is fortunate, as if he were held close in the spiritual embrace of his powerful forefathers of antiquity. Each ancestral family is jealously proud of its ancient traditions and genealogies, and as some of these are transmitted at marriage, it follows that a marriage within its ranks is desirable from a business standpoint. Moreover, it is recognized that the husband obtains more presents than the wife at the wedding and that her relatives are more likely to be generous when their son-in-law is one to whom they are related. Indeed, some ancestral families are so "stingy," (to use the Bella Coola expression), that for generations they have habitually married endogamously. In such cases it is not unknown for the children of first cousins to mate, though this is usually regarded as not quite proper. The most common marriages are between the grandchildren and great-grandchildren of first cousins, or between the child and grandchild of a first cousin when of suitable age. According to mythology, unions have sometimes taken place between brother and sister in order to preserve the traditions within the family, and it appears highly probable that marriages have occasionally occurred between first cousins, although no specific instances of this could be learnt. As long as the laws against incest are obeyed, any girl of appropriate age who is addressed as nemas (I, p. 153) is a fit partner. Since ancestral families have usually become localized in certain villages, there is a strong leaning to local endogamy, though this is not compulsory. The restrictions

[illegible] on marriage are of a bilateral nature, and the prohibitions are equally bilateral, with a tendency to become patrilineal, in accordance with the patrilineal tendency of the ancestral family in already described.

[illegible] Although these considerations greatly restrict the selection of a suitable daughter-in-law, a number of choices always remain. The parents of the prospective bridegroom consider the material advantages of each of these. Since the ability of a man to give protection depends largely on the wealth contributed by his wife's immediate family, wise parents choose a girl whose brothers are lazy. Moreover, they know that their son's children will receive prerogatives from their maternal grandparents, hence it is desirable to choose those who have prized doctor dances, or other valuable rights. Ancestral names are not so important, because these are the potential property of all members of the ancestral family. A great consideration is the industriousness of the girl herself, though this is of less moment than the working ability of her father and brothers. Marriage was discussed with a very old man who had had four wives. After describing the idiosyncrasies of the four, he continued:

"My last wife was by far the best. Her family gave me many presents."

[illegible] Frequently the choice of a wife is simplified by an institution which may be termed "return marriage." If, for example, a few generations ago a woman was married into another ancestral family, or into a distant branch of her own, it was considered proper for a man of her family to receive as wife a woman of the family into which she had married. During the previous wedding rites the woman's family bestowed much wealth and valuable prerogatives; it is proper that the latter should be restored to the ancestral family of their owners. A return marriage also binds two families together, with consequent strength to the children. A few examples will make the matter clear.

583 at present, though even now it is considered highly desirable.
[178] The sentiment is that already described: the more closely the parents are bound together by ties of common ancestry, the greater will be their children's ceremonial strength. Further, reciprocal alliances of this type obviate all danger of feuds, since return marriages are not required.

582 In recent years it has become fashionable, or socially
178 "smart," with some Bella Coola families to seek wives from 648 unrelated ancestral families, and even from other tribes. It is said that this practice was initiated by Pudas, an important chief who died between 1870 and 1880. He sought foreign marriages on account of the prerogatives which were brought as dowers by his wives, and considered that such rights, transmissable to his children, more than compensated for the lack of strength peovided by related ancestors. Many have followed his example, with the result that some ancestral families have entirely abandoned the endogamic tendency. Boas (p. 124) has made the same observation. Although this exogamic
[581] principle is directly contrary to that which has already been described, yet it should be noted that each has the same explanation—the search for a wife able to bring most to her as yet unborn children.

584 Should the parents consider a foreign woman as wife for 581 their son, then her worth is discussed from every angle. One woman may have the right to good hunting grounds, the family of another may have some valuable sisook prerogatives, a third some kusiut rites. Anxious thought is put on the relative values of these. One man had heard of the French system of dot, and emphasized strongly how far superior to, and more sensible it was than the Canadian practice. In recent years
[178] the younger Bella Coola have been arranging their own marriages, and the older men lament bitterly that they are influenced only by the beauty and working ability of the girl, not by her real worth, the prerogatives which she can bring to her children.

Although parents consider chiefly the ancestry of their future daughter-in-law, yet they are not entirely oblivious to the girl herself. She must be of about the same age as their son, preferably a year or two older. Should the wife be the younger, it is thought that she ages rapidly until she appears as old as her husband. Boys usually marry at seventeen or eighteen, and it is essential that the woman chosen for wife must have been concealed for at least a year following puberty. Nor is a weakly girl chosen, or one of notoriously bad temper. As their son reaches the age of marriage, his parents usually consult him, though it is not usual for him to gainsay their wishes. A girl who has been leading a notoriously lax life is not desired, though this is most unusual for the daughter of a chief. The feeling is that such a girl would be a faithless and fickle wife, rather than any objection to her sins as such. 584 581 [582]

Realising the importance of marriage, the parents of a boy discuss and plan the event for years, weighing the relative value of girls whom they think they could obtain for their son. By the time he has reached the age of fourteen or fifteen, they have decided on the most suitable partner, and it then becomes necessary to consult her parents and win their approval. 584

PERIOD OF ENGAGEMENT

When the parents of the young man (whom it will be convenient to term X) have at last decided on a suitable partner, they next choose an intermediary for the first proposal. In all these discussions the elderly relatives of the parents take a leading part, and especially their own parents if alive. Sometimes X's father himself interviews the father of the girl (here termed Y), at other times he asks some friend to do so. The matter is not supposed to be generally known, and the intermediary goes to Y's father's house, and quietly tells her parents that X's family would like their daughter to become X's wife. This preliminary asking is done unostentatiously, at any time and in any place, and the messenger withdraws after giving his message. In all probability Y's family have already re-

595 556 two, but only one of great importance could hope to aspire to more, while the case of Patlu was considered to be unique and highly desirable.

595 578 A chief's wives always lived in the same house, and it is said that disputes were frequent. Patlu endeavoured to prevent jealousy by providing each woman with a special bedroom and sleeping for a single night with each in order. One informant had two wives when a young man, and he found that the only way to avoid constant bickering was by sleeping in one bed, between them. The evidence seems clear that plurality of wives was usually the cause of considerable friction, though this never deterred a man from taking a second wife if he could. The only special rule of incest in this regard was that two sisters could not be married at the same time.

[835] [582]

595 183 626 In answer to questions about polyandry, two men told of a licentious woman who had two feeble-minded husbands between whom she used to sleep. The whole affair was considered disgusting, but public opinion did not ostracize the offenders since a person's marital affairs were considered to concern the individual only. It was accordingly assumed that the institution of true polyandry did not exist, when, unexpectedly, information was volunteered about its occurrence in the families of influential men. A very powerful chief, if his only child was a daughter, quite frequently married her simultaneously to the sons of other chiefs. She was thus considered most fortunate, since only a wealthy man could provide for a daughter in this way, and expend the large quantities of goods necessary to ensure her proper marriage in each case. The husbands were never brothers, and seldom related, since the ambitious parent wished to ally his daughter with different ancestral families for the benefit of any resultant children. The joint wife was accustomed to live for a number of months in the home of one of her husbands, with her other husbands forming part of his household. She would then move to the house of another, who assumed the leadership of the group,

[624] 575 Indians the tradition is considered much more closely the property of the person who has it in charge than it is among the southwestern Indians. A description of the clan's ceremonial has been given by Jacobsen in the paper above referred to.[1]

[624] 424 A clan legend which is illustrated in the clan's ceremonial is called by the Bella Coola "Semsim" or "Sem'yum." These traditions are the exclusive property of each clan. The laws according to which they descend from generation to generation differ from the laws prevailing among the other Coast tribes. The inhabitants of each Bella Coola village are not subdivided [621] into clans, gentes, or septs; but each village community forms a unit, and possesses the same tradition. In order to keep the tradition in the tribe, the law requires that no person shall marry outside of his own village community. [624] 424 Thus the clan tradition is kept the exclusive property of the village community by means of endogamy. I have made very careful inquiries in regard [582] to this point, and all the old men make substantially the same statement. Even marriages among near relatives are permitted,[2] and although marriages of people who are distantly related, or not related at all, are preferred, it even happens that cousins marry, or that an uncle marries his niece, in order to keep the clan tradition from being acquired by another village community. It seems, however, that, owing to the influence of the Coast tribes, the endogamic system has begun to give way to an exogamic system. Powerful [622] and wealthy chiefs marry outside of their own village community, in order to secure an additional clan legend through marriage. This new system agrees with the one prevalent among the Kwakiutl tribes.

575 [624] 796 The hi'ulat, as stated before, is a religious ceremony in which all the deities of heaven are personified. The members of various clans are initiated according to their clan traditions; but the same societies and the same deities appear in the traditions of all the various clans. From what little I have been able to learn, it seems that there is an elaborate opening of the whole ceremonial, corresponding to the opening of the ceremonial among the Kwakiutl. I received the following description of the opening ceremonial:—

575 796 The person who invites to the hi'ulat, that is to say, the man whose son is to be initiated into one of the secret societies according to the tradition of his clan, requests a person who is called E'ulem to invite the nine brothers [796] and their sister, who reside in the House of Hyiha, and in whose charge the hi'ulat is placed. The names of the brothers are Xwaxwaxwa'ula, Xi'nuiwa, Qaq'ooxk'ilk'a, Qi'ustwa, Ainuk'ula, Ai'uuk'ilk'a, K'ek'ilus, Qakuu'wa, Ai'uuk'; and that of their sister, Ulmi'qaiwaxa (see p. 33). In the rear of the house an elevated room is prepared for E'ulem, in which he lies down. He is covered with cings made of red cedar-bark. For four days he stays follow either father or mother, but that it had not the right to use the property of both parents. It seems to my mind that the former method was more likely to develop under the existing social conditions, and that to this reason we must ascribe the development of an endogamic system among the Bella Coola. The occurrence of endogamic marriage among this tribe is quite isolated on the Pacific coast. All the other tribes have exogamic institutions, and by this means preserve their property rights. It is interesting to note that the northern Kwakiutl, who originally seem to have been organized in village communities, have adopted exogamic institutions; but there is a notable difference, in the organization of the village community, between the Bella Coola and the Kwakiutl. Among the Bella Coola we generally find four ancestors to each village,—usually three men and one woman. It is true that these are generally called brothers and sisters, but they were created independently by Sun, and are therefore not necessarily considered as blood relations. Among the Kwakiutl the village community are considered the descendants of one single being; consequently, among the latter tribe they are all relatives, who are forbidden to intermarry; while among the Bella Coola they are not relatives, and may intermarry.

My interest is, therefore, that the curious social system of the Bella Coola developed through the influence of the customs of the Coast tribes upon the home social unit of the Salish village community. The possession of clan traditions was felt as a great advantage, and consequently the desire developed to possess clan traditions. These were acquired partly by intermarriage with the Coast tribes, as is shown by the fact that many of these traditions are borrowed from these tribes, partly by independent invention. The desire to guard the traditions which were once acquired led to the development of endogamic institutions, in order to prevent the spread of the traditions over the whole tribe.

The jealousy with which the traditions are guarded has had the effect of making each family try to prevent other families from knowing its own clan traditions. For this reason the clan traditions of the whole tribe are remarkably inconsistent. We find, for instance, that the well-known raven legend of the northern Coast tribes has been utilized by many families as a family tradition. But while one family uses one part of the tradition, other families use other parts of the same tradition. Thus it happens that among the Bella Coola we find the most contradictory myths in regard to important events in the world's history. Some families maintain that the Raven liberated the sun, while, according to another one, the Mink was essential in bringing about the present state of affairs. Still others say that Tsimo'ten, during his travels, caused the sun to appear. The discrepancies in the traditions referring to the visit of the Mink and Wasp to their fathers, the Sun, are also very remarkable. Although a considerable amount of 614 553 [773] The ancestral family may, therefore, be defined as those whose ätsiqtul names are embodied in the same origin myth.

What is the stability of this group?

In consequence of the large number of names theoretically embodied in every myth, and of the necessity for validating the bestowal of any one of these by means of presents, it follows that there is always a large number of dormant names. The Bella Coola describe these as being, "In the burial ground." They are, in fact, dead. Any one of these may be resurrected by any member of the ancestral family. If a woman marries into a foreign tribe her relatives occasionally give her husband, outright, an ancestral name. In such a case that name is permanently alienated from the family to which it formerly belonged; this should happen only when the group is reduced to a few individuals, all of whom agree to the transaction. [583] But more often a woman takes as a wedding gift to her husband a name which it is understood cannot be transmitted to one of his relatives unless he has children. On the death of the childless husband, this designation reverts to his widow's ancestral family. If there are children, they cement the bond of friendship between the two families. The brother of a woman so married also bestows names on her children, as further mark of their incorporation into her ancestral family. [583] It is customary and proper, however, for the ancestral family into which a woman is married and bears children to reciprocate the compliment a few generations later, and by the marriage of one of their women to restore such names to the ancestral family to which they originally belonged. According to the Bella Coola, this practice of "return-marriage" has been the rule since the first exogamic marriages of the first people, with the result that names usually return to the patrilineal descendants of the first people to use them.

611 614 If a woman marries outside her ancestral family, her children will belong to at least two distinct ancestral groups. It is difficult to say how long an individual remembers the dif-

*556 574 [203] Although guests from different tribes are sometimes invited to other ceremonials, it is at potlatches that they are essential. Since the validity of such transactions as marriages, divorces, or the assumption of professional prerogatives depends on the presence of witnesses, and since the importance of such a rite depends on the number of witnesses, a man is always eager to carry out any public performance at a potlatch when he is sure of the attention of foreigners, and the consequent wider diffusion of knowledge of what he has done. The man who has invited guests is usually willing to allow others to perform at his potlatch, since it increases the complexity and importance [184] of the affair. It follows that no two potlatches are alike; one will contain features entirely lacking in another. Moreover, the wealth of the donor determines how many rites he himself will cause to be performed. The fundamental concept of the potlatch is the inviting of guests from abroad to witness rites [769] in connection with an ancestral myth, especially the return of a recently deceased relative of the donor to visit the living.

*556 796 At any important potlatch the following rites are carried out, and in the account of the ritual it will be assumed that these alone are taking place. If the reader bears this summary in mind, he is less likely to be confused by the complication of rites.

(1) The return of a dead ancestor to visit the living.

[575] [553] (2) The initiation of young men or women into the susook society. This includes the validation of a susook name for each, and a period of seclusion in the back-room. The initiates may either be relatives of the donor of the potlatch, or young persons whose relatives are taking the opportunity to carry out the rite in the presence of foreigners. Some of the initiates may already be members of the society, undergoing a further period of seclusion in order to increase their status by a further distribution of presents.

[554] [858] [583] (3) The payment by the wife of the donor and her family of goods to "rebuy" her from her husband. This is a legal fiction, though necessary to maintain the status of the children.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

Coola say that the return of the dead "washes away grief," and unquestionably it has a comforting effect on the mind of the donor of the potlatch. 556* 769

(3) Wealth. Unless a man has the necessary goods with which to make presents he cannot invite guests, no matter how important may be his ancestral myths and names. Some of this wealth he may be able to amass by his own labours, but unless he is assisted by his wife's family it is virtually impossible for him to succeed. The Bella Coola believe that a man cannot become a chief except through large payments made by a woman's family when they "rebuy" her from her husband. In other words, no man can succeed without the support of his wife. In choosing a mate a man is guided almost entirely by the ability of her family to give him financial support. In some cases an elderly couple assist a married son to give a potlatch; this custom, though considered quite proper, is not common. 476 556* 602 [583] [622] [581]

(4) Supernatural assistance. To the Bella Coola this is quite as important as the preceding. One man may work very hard but his efforts are never crowned with success, whereas another man will prosper in every venture. This is due to the supernatural attributes given by the supreme god to the latter. By prayer, ceremonial chastity, and other means, a man may increase the powers granted to him, but if these are entirely lacking, he can never hope to rise to the position of chief. 556* 787

In describing the potlatch, it will be convenient to refer to the donor as X, and assume him to be a middle-aged member of the nuxek society, whose seat and name, though duly ratified, lack importance through his previous failure to give large presents. 556*

For a number of years X has prospered. He has amassed quantities of skins, blankets, tools, copper ornaments, clothing, canoes, baskets, dentalium shell, slaves, and other valuables.

Pre-
* 556 sently the guests assemble, those who are used wearing on [575] their heads one or more weasel skins as a mark of membership
[237] in the society. Each takes the seat to which he is entitled,
[292] the chiefs behind the fire, or on either side of it, the commoners,
[554] slaves, and foreigners in the two corners nearest the door. The heralds move to and fro between door and fire, their constant exchange of remarks adding to the general interest of the affair. It is the function of a herald to lend dignity to chiefs by
[203] the tone of his observations, but should one fail to live up to his station, the herald is privileged to comment thereon. In some respects his position approximates that of a buffoon, but as a herald always receives valuable presents, the office is sometimes accepted by ambitious young men, willing to undertake the slightly derogatory duties in return for the substantial gain.

264 A number of young lads, friends or relatives of X, distribute the food. It is placed in boxes; an important chief is not called
* 556 upon to share with any one, whereas six or seven men of no
[883] standing may partake from one box. These receptacles, with whatever food remains in them, are taken home by the guests; otherwise the host would be insulted. Many boxes are lost in [578] this way, a source of considerable irritation. After the first course, a second follows, consisting of a different kind of food in another box, and in some cases there is a third, and even a fourth course. A chief must never appear stingy. The more he gives, the more does his prestige increase. Also, a man who gives freely receives abundantly, so that generosity brings its
● 589 reward.

* 556 Next, the father or other male relative of X's wife, or a fluent friend who speaks for him, stands up and makes a speech, [537] extolling the fame of his own family by sketching in general outlines one of the myths of his ancestors, and announcing that
[425] X's wife is taking to her husband some portion of it. This may [424] be the prerogative of using a spoon carved, for example, with the shape of a beaver; or a carved box, or a totem-pole with [532] certain figures on it, or the right to use a painting of a grizzly bear on the wall of his house, or an ancestral name.

bear on the wall of his house, or an ancestral name. The speaker always recounts the whole myth before announcing which portion of it is transmitted to X as a prerogative. It is understood that this transference will be duly validated by presents to X when he gives his potlatch. Such are termed dzāmāuxmtxum and signify the repurchase of a wife from her husband. Though this is known to be a fiction it has extreme social importance. Unless dzāmāuxmtxum is paid there is an ineradicable blot upon the children; in fact, it is one of the essentials of a legal marriage. All prerogatives thus transferred on xlāxtxum become the property of X and will in time pass to his children, unless recalled to the wife's family by further repurchase (dzāmāuxmtxum) money or goods. In this fashion elements of family myths become scattered, and one of the considerations in choosing a wife is to select a woman able to bring back some missing part of the husband's myth. 556* 425 583 [581]

The usual present is an ancestral name, which X henceforth uses as potlatches as his most distinguished title, though the myth in which it is incorporated does not belong to him. As long as the name remains in X's family those who originally owned it are unable to make use of it. Such a name is said to be "dragged across" by the wife to her husband, the immense weight or importance of the designation being compared with the dragging of a heavy log. Occasionally, the father of a married woman, animated by the kindliest feelings towards his son-in-law, may give him outright a myth with all the names embodied therein. This can happen only where there are no other survivors of the family. In such a case when the myth is recounted it must always be mentioned how it has been obtained. The number and type of the prerogatives transferred depend upon the sentiments with which his wife's family regard X. If, in addition to being a worthy man, he is member of their ancestral family, or of one with which his wife's has frequently intermarried, so that in course of generations prerogatives have intermingled, there is less objection to giving him such rights than if he were an unrelated individual. with a number of the large cone-shaped whistles used for sisaok ceremonial. Towards dawn, sounds come from these, and sometimes a dull thump is heard on the roof, as if a heavy being had landed there. At once there is great excitement within the house. The voices of supernatural people prove them to be at hand. No one is allowed to leave except a sisaok siki[9] who is skilled in dealing with Mulakila,[10] also called Sixsixqwtnam, the supernatural being closely connected with the sisaok ritual. Those within can hear the voice of the siki raised as if he were speaking to someone at a distance.

"Chief, you have come too early," he says. "The house is not yet ready. Please return later."

He is answered by loud whistling, which grows fainter, as if the being who made it were moving away. In reality the young men are merely blowing less forcibly into the whistles.

[9]The accounts of all informants agree that much of the sisaok ritual was newly imported into Bella Coola from Bella Bella. According to some statements, Putlus, a Bella Coola chief who died between 1870 and 1880, married a Bella Bella wife, also one from Rivers Inlet, and it was these two women who brought with them as dower certain sisaok prerogatives. It is said that previous to that time the Bella Coola did not understand the use of the large cone-shaped whistles, nor were they able to summon the supernatural beings to the youths secluded in the back-room, nor to dispel the beings at the conclusion of the rites. On the other hand, some Bella Coola claim that their first ancestors brought the whistles with them from the land above. It is probable that the calling in of the supernatural beings is a recent addition to the potlatch, which accounts for the contradictory accounts, but whether or not the whistles are a new feature is more doubtful. It appears certain that the prerogative of siki has recently been obtained from the Bella Bella. Siki means "the one who cures," and the name is given to the man whose prerogative it is to tend the kusiut initiates in whom supernatural powers are located. In Bella Bella there is a similar functionary for sisaok matters, known as a hai-alakila. Through intermarriage several Bella Coola have recently obtained this prerogative; in each case it is frankly stated that it has been derived from the Bella Bella. The Bella Coola apply to these, so favoured, the term siki, as they do for the kusiut "curer," though the Bella Bella name, hai-alakila, is used with equal frequency. The present siki have endeavoured to claim for themselves certain ceremonial functions formerly carried out by any sisaok. In this account of a potlatch it is assumed that a siki is functioning on all occasions, but in many cases any senior sisaok is considered sufficiently close to the supernatural beings to act satisfactorily. Until about 1870 it is clear that any sisaok was regarded as capable of doing so.

[10]Knowledge of this being is said to have been acquired by the marriage of a certain Smaxax of Kimsquit to a Bella Bella woman in the beginning of time.

533 earliest ancestors, and the text is commonly grandiloquently *556 phrased.[19] Frequently the singers alter the words slightly to suit the occasion, and sometimes compose entirely new words [171] for an old tune. As they sing, they are aided by some of X's friends who rise and stand between the fire and the front door.
[532] They occasionally wear forehead masks carved with his crest to add dignity to the rite.

203 After the song the chiefs continue their meal, and there is much practical joking with the heralds.

522 "Don't you want some food?" X calls to one of them.

*556 Without waiting for an answer he throws a box containing the liquid pulp, inclined at such an angle that the mess is spattered over the recipient. Occasionally, a herald will succeed in catching a box without spilling the contents, but usually he is smeared from head to foot, while the spectators shriek with laughter. It is one of the functions of a herald to be a laughing stock for the visitors.

*556 During the afternoon X's wife and the members of her family deliver to him the goods which they have amassed to ●583 "re-buy" her from her husband. These are called "washing material," as if they supplied X with wash-basin and toilet necessities. The speaker orates how the wife has lived up to her obligation in making this presentation, and how it will clear the path for her children. These goods will later on be distributed by X. They can be used for:

(1) Repayment of potlatch debts, or

(2) Making potlatch investments, or

(3) Validating names, either sisaak or ancestral, for the children of his relatives.

It would be most disgraceful should any of the goods be applied to validating sisaak names for any of X's own children, because they have come from his wife's people and react to the advantage of her children in any case. These goods are not returnable by X to his wife's family. A question on this point was regarded as highly amusing. If used for investment-gifts, the presents received in return are given to X, not to his wife's relations. 556* 583

A speaker, acting on instructions from the brother or other member of X's wife's family, also announces what names, portions of myth-prerogatives, or other privileges she is bestowing on her husband. After that the people disperse, although they are free to re-enter the house, where, during the afternoon, arrangements are being made for the elaborate ceremonial which takes place that night. 556*

Towards dusk the guests reassemble and take their places as before. Part of the goods which X proposes to give away has been brought in, and, aided by members of his family, he busies himself recounting and making final plans for its distribution. As the Bella Coola have no system of writing, accurate division of goods at a potlatch causes considerable difficulty and worry to the donor. A slighted guest will feel aggrieved, and the sacred nature of the rite will have been subjected to insult if arrangements are not satisfactory. The first business is the settlement of debts by X to the members of his own village. He may perhaps have borrowed fifty blankets ten years previously from a certain individual whom he now intends to repay, with foreign guests as witnesses to the transaction. X always endeavours to reimburse with as large a premium as possible, because by so doing he displays his nobility of mind to the assemblage; but if he can restore only the amount borrowed, or the same with a small increase, there will be no trouble such as might occur should he fail to return at least the principal. When the debt has been settled with interest the matter is at an end, for there is no compulsion upon the man who receives the additional sum to repay this with interest in his turn. The amount previously lent, and the occasion, are always publicly announced, so that all are made aware of his generosity with regard to interest. [212] [578] 426 556*

In Kimsquit it was customary at this stage of the proceed- 556* 184

plied to provide abundant food for all; it became the ancestor of all the beaver of the upper valley. Owing to their position higher up the Bella Coola, Taiałwala and his brothers considered that they were nearer to the sun than any of the people dwelling below, a fact of which they were exceedingly proud. Moreover, having been sent down by him, the sun was their crest. 539

There were two large boulders in the river near the settlement, which Ałquałtm had shown Taiałwala how to use as supports for a salmon-weir. With the help of his brothers, a hole was drilled in one of the rocks; then they felled a large tree upstream and allowed it to drift down until the butt lodged in the perforated boulder and the head swung across against the other. With this as base, other trunks were woven in upright so that the river was almost spanned and a fine dam constructed. In this they caught so many salmon that Taiałwala and his brothers were able to call people from far and near to potlatches and feast them liberally on the fish. In course of time their sister was married to a chief from another town. Henceforth, whenever one of her brothers gave a potlatch, he was able to rebuy his sister on a lavish scale with the teeming salmon. The sun had taught the woman a song for such occasions, which has since been used as a prerogative by her descendants when rebuying themselves from their husbands. [424] [583]

Taiałwala made a long voyage of exploration during which he reached the Skeena River. He made friends with the inhabitants of the town, Q̓ałwan, who gave him the name, Xwałkw,[18] meaning whale in their language. Continuing his journey, he ultimately circled the earth before returning home. He obtained several other designations, including Ałkamła from the Kwatna people.[19]

Years after the settlement of Snałk'ał, the drilled stone supporting the salmon-weir broke and the ruins were swept away downstream. The people cut their hair and blackened their faces in mourning, then moved to Stuax where a number of their daughters had married chiefs.

air. As they did so the feathers began to move, gradually rising in the air until some passed through the roof. It was as if a miniature whirlwind of gentle power were agitating them. As the three continued to use the sticks, the corpse itself began to move, finally disintegrating into the down and passing through the roof. As it did so the three said:

"Go back whence we came. Yr ....."

Since that time the people of Owikì have disposed of their dead in this manner.

The first Ałkałałc brought with him from above not only the right to a nanał dance, but also a Cannibal hamat dance (II, p. 71) with the Bella Bella name Łełnaz. He had, moreover, the rare privilege of performing hamat and nanał rites on alternate nights.

This myth is important since it embodies an account of the disappearance of a corpse through a roof, a method of removal of the dead now practised by the Bella Coola in the case of chiefs. This means is recognized by the Bella Coola to have been a recent introduction from either Bella Bella or Rivers Inlet to Tal'ùs, and thence to Bella Coola. Judging from this account, it would appear that such a method of removal of a corpse must be considered as originally a prerogative embodied in a myth, although it has ceased to be regarded as such in Bella Coola. The man from whom this tradition was obtained said it was only one of the type current in Bella Coola, though such are common in Bella Bella. It was obtained by the marriage of one of his ancestors to a woman of Owikì, and was used as theme for a mourning-ceremony at the death of his sister.

AN EARLY BELLA BELLA MYTH TRANSMITTED BY MARRIAGE TO BELLA COOLA*

In the beginning of time, when the population of the earth consisted only of the few people who had come down from above, Yałkimat went to the Bella Bella town, Łqqyał, where, as was common at that period, people had no houses but were sheltered under huge trees which Łłqwałłw had placed there for that purpose. Yałkimat was in the form of a man at the time and fell in love with a girl of the village. Her father, Nà·ai, agreed to the match and the two were married. The husband never slept with his wife; when he wished children, he willed that they

of the term is very different from its use among the northern tribes. 582 171

Having eliminated those girls who are too closely related, or who are unsuited on account of the poverty of their parents, 581 the father and mother can concentrate on others of about the same age as their son. The most desirable is a member of the ancestral family of one of the parents. This obviates the dangers and difficulties of marriage with a stranger, and any children will be born into the close-knit circle of related ancestors stretching back to the beginning of time. They consider that such a child is fortunate, as if he were held close in the spiritual embrace of his powerful forefathers of antiquity. Each ancestral family is jealously proud of its ancient traditions and prerogatives, and as some of these are transmitted at marriage, it follows that a mating within its ranks is desirable from a business standpoint. Moreover, it is recognized that the husband obtains more presents than the wife [583] at the wedding and that her relatives are more likely to be generous when their son-in-law is one to whom they are related. Indeed, some ancestral families are so "stingy," (to use the Bella Coola expression), that for generations they have habitually married endogamously. [582] In such cases it is not unknown for the children of first cousins to mate, though this is usually regarded as not quite proper. The most common marriages are between the grandchildren and great-grandchildren of first 582 cousins, or between the child and grandchild of a first cousin when of suitable age. According to mythology, unions have sometimes taken place between brother and sister in order to [773] preserve the traditions within the family, and it appears highly probable that marriages have occasionally occurred between first cousins, although no specific instances of this could be learnt. As long as the laws against incest are obeyed, any girl of appropriate age who is addressed as numao (I, p. 153) is a fit partner. Since ancestral families have usually become localized in certain villages, there is a strong leaning to local endogamy, though this is not compulsory. The restrictions

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

582 on marriage are of a bilateral nature, and the preferences are equally bilateral, with a tendency to become patrilineal, in accordance with the patrilineal tendency of the ancestral family as already described.

581 Although these considerations greatly restrict the selection of a suitable daughter-in-law, a number of choices always remain. The parents of the prospective bridegroom consider the material advantages of each of these. Since the ability of a man to give potlatches depends largely on the wealth contributed by his wife's immediate family, wise parents eliminate a girl whose brothers are lazy. Moreover, they know that their son's children will receive prerogatives from their maternal grandparents, hence it is desirable to choose those who have prized kusiut dances, or other valuable rights. Ancestral names are not so important, because these are the potential property of all members of the ancestral family. A great consideration is the industriousness of the girl herself, though this is of less moment than the working ability of her father and brothers. Marriage was discussed with a very old man who had had four wives. After describing the idiosyncrasies of the four, he continued:

"My last wife was by far the best. Her family gave me many presents."

583 [581] Frequently the choice of a wife is simplified by an institution which may be termed "return marriage." If, for example, a few generations ago a woman was married into another ancestral family, or into a distant branch of her own, it was considered proper for a man of her family to receive as wife a woman of the family into which she had married. During the previous wedding rites the woman's family bestowed much wealth and valuable prerogatives; it is proper that the latter should be restored to the ancestral family of their owners. A return marriage also binds two families together, with consequent strength to the children. A few examples will make the matter clear.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

In the beginning of time it is believed that a son of Smaoan married the daughter of a Kitlobe chief (I, p. 338). As dower she brought her husband several Kitlobe names, which were transmitted in time to her children and which remained in Smaoan's home, Kimsquit, for many generations. The Bella Coola believe that it was remembered for hundreds of years that these designations did not belong there. Whenever one was conferred, the myth was recounted to tell how it first came to Kimsquit; whereas in Kitlobe when the myth from which the names were taken was related, it was always added that those in question could not be used since they were now in Kimsquit. About one hundred and fifty years ago, Ätsqutl, a Kimsquit woman, was married to a Kitlobe man to repay this debt, and cement friendship between the two tribes. She took as dower the names long ago brought from Kitlobe. Similarly, if any name or other prerogative of an ancestral myth has been alienated from the ancestral family to which it belongs, a father searches for a woman who will be able to restore it to his son as a marriage gift. The word used for searching is "hunt," the term applied to seeking fur-bearing animals. 173 583 648

The accompanying pedigree illustrates a return marriage. Qwakila's daughter was married to a Fort Rupert man and took with her as dower several Bella Coola names and other prerogatives. The loss of these was remembered and they were brought back by the marriage of Yäkutsi, a member of Qwakila's ancestral family, with a daughter of the woman who had gone to Fort Rupert. Usually several generations elapse before a return marriage is made. This incident was perfectly well known to the son of Yäkutsi.

Qwakila of Qwaqa-ti — Daughter

Yäkutsi of Qwaqa-ti

If parents who are seeking a wife for their son have also a daughter approaching marriageable age, they may try to avoid a later return marriage by arranging that their daughter shall be married to a brother, or other near relative, of their son's wife. Exchange marriage was formerly more common than 583 [178]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

583 at present, though even now it is considered highly desirable.
[178] The sentiment is that already described: the more closely the parents are bound together by ties of common ancestry, the greater will be their children's ceremonial strength. Further, reciprocal alliances of this type obviate all danger of feuds, since return marriages are not required.

582 In recent years it has become fashionable, or socially
178 "smart," with some Bella Coola families to seek wives from 648 unrelated ancestral families, and even from other tribes. It is said that this practice was initiated by Patlas, an important chief who died between 1870 and 1880. He sought foreign marriages on account of the prerogatives which were brought as dowers by his wives, and considered that such rights, transmissable to his children, more than compensated for the lack of strength provided by related ancestors. Many have followed his example, with the result that some ancestral families have entirely abandoned the endogamic tendency. Boas (p. 124) has made the same observation. Although this exogamic
[581] principle is directly contrary to that which has already been described, yet it should be noted that each has the same explanation—the search for a wife able to bring most to her as yet unborn children.

584 Should the parents consider a foreign woman as wife for 581 their son, then her worth is discussed from every angle. One woman may have the right to good hunting grounds, the family of another may have some valuable nuseek prerogatives, a third some kaxiat rites. Anxious thought is put on the relative values of these. One man had heard of the French system of dot, and emphasized strongly how far superior to, and more sensible it was than the Canadian practice. In recent years
[178] the younger Bella Coola have been arranging their own marriages, and the older men lament bitterly that they are influenced only by the beauty and working ability of the girl, not by her real worth, the prerogatives which she can bring to her children.

Although parents consider chiefly the ancestry of their

584 ceived information of the proposed marriage, but they always plead ignorance, and deliberate for several days. Y's parents and other relatives take part in the discussion, and Y herself may likewise be taken into confidence. Although a daughter has, theoretically, little choice, in practice she exercises a great deal of influence. Her mother and father weigh the suitor's [581] eligibility not only with regard to wealth and ancestral possessions, but consider his character. An immoral young man is not desirable, though neither is one who is impotent.

If Y's relatives agree to the proposal, some one of them informs the intermediary, or X's father, and the young people are considered to be engaged. The fact is supposed to be kept secret for several days, although the news usually becomes known sooner. X's relatives as soon as possible take a number 583 of presents to Y's family. These are given in private, and are 584 termed "secret gifts"; they are said to give strength to the future children. Since no witnesses are present it follows that no social prestige accrues from the transaction. The relatives included in the "family" of either X or Y are not always the same; uncles, aunts, grandparents, may or may not take part in the giving and receiving of presents, the parents alone always do so. Sometimes distant relatives take a leading part in the arrangements, either in hope of receiving valuable gifts, or of obtaining social influence by lavish giving. If X's relatives have reason to believe that Y's family will accept their proposal, several of them may go in company and actually carry the "secret gifts" to Y's house at the time of making the first proposal. Should this be rejected, they merely carry away their goods, and as the affair has been private, no one's vanity is hurt.

The acceptance of "secret gifts" binds the engagement of X and Y, but a few days elapse before this is made public. If 552, X's family is wealthy, his father, or other near relative, pre- 584 sently invites all the inhabitants of the village to his house. 535 The singers, in their usual stations behind the fire, strike up 575 the tune of some kwaiat and the owner of the song, thus warned, dances in time to it. Using their own discretion, the musicians proceed to beat out the time for kusiut after kusiut, and each performs. In like fashion they then beat out the tune of one susook after another, and each member of that society gives his dance. Since none of the supernatural beings is present, the affair is non-sacred. The singers consult with the host as to the number of songs to be used. When they stop at last, X's father, aided by his younger relatives, gives valuable presents of food. No mention of the coming marriage is made, but the rite gives the donor an opportunity of displaying his generosity as a chief and indirectly increases the importance of the wedding because the value of the food will later be remembered in connection with it. [589]

If X's father is very wealthy, he may recall the people for several nights, always providing the same type of entertainment, and always giving food. He uses his own judgment as to the number of such entertainments, but at that which he decides shall be the last, he announces:

"Tomorrow we shall go to Y's father's house."

If X's father does not wish to give away such large quantities of food he may omit the dancing in his own house and make this announcement at a potlatch, a kusiut dance,[5] or any other public gathering. But the more elaborate the ceremonial, the greater is the importance of the marriage in the eyes of the Bella Coola, which in turn increases the strength of the children who may result from it. [858]

On the morning after this declaration, X's father calls to his house those whom he wishes to be witnesses of the alliance that has been planned. These include as many of his relatives and those of his wife as he desires, and often intimate friends. These individuals comprise the group interested, on behalf of X, in the marriage; they provide the goods which are given for him, and receive the presents from the corresponding group of Y's relatives. Anyone having the necessary financial ability 583 584 is glad of this opportunity to demonstrate it, but a poor man can decline without loss of social esteem.

Carrying presents, the specific value of which is immaterial, they set out for Y's house. Her father, accompanied by his relatives, has been warned and is waiting at the door. A herald, or other eloquent speaker, addresses them on behalf of X's father. He says in effect:

"We do not come secretly or wrongfully to steal something from you. We come with the loftiest intentions. Great is our affection for your child. What we are about to do has long been a practice of our two families [if the two families have intermarried in past generations]; let us do according to our wishes. I am the opening."[4]

Then X's father throws on the ground several stones, representing slaves who will later be given to Y's relatives. These are said to "open the door," that is, to make clear the entrance of X and his relatives into Y's house. There is the added significance that they start upon a clear road the children whom it is hoped will result from the marriage. This thought finds expression in many rites both during engagement and at the wedding ceremony itself. After throwing the stones, X's father gives gifts to Y, to her father, her mother, and to her other relatives assembled. These are of such great value that X's father sometimes almost impoverishes himself, but he knows that though these will never actually be returned, Y's family will be proud to uphold their dignity, and the importance of Y, by equally lavish givings.

Y's father now invites his guests to enter his house, and ushers them to their duly validated seats where the food that has been prepared is served with all solemnity in the usual food-boxes. Then Y's family give presents to X's family, that is to all who have come to share in the marriage. These goods are known as "working clothes"; they are usually of less value

[4] Opening, ckelmenjlut. This term is applied to the whole ceremony at Y's house and, like it, has a double significance, as opening the way for the marriage, and clearing the path for the future children.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948

than the presents just given by X's relatives, though occasionally they may exceed them. Y's father, or a herald, or an eloquent friend on his behalf, speaks to the following effect: 583 584

"Be bold. Henceforth you will have to work a very long time for us. We will let you know when we need your services."

The significance of this speech lies in the fact that X, and to a certain extent his relatives, are expected to perform almost menial tasks for Y's father during the period of engagement, which has now been duly ratified. X's father and his followers now leave Y's house. It is immaterial whether or not X and Y themselves have been present. It is important that this formal acknowledgment of the engagement should take place during the day; otherwise any children resulting from the marriage could be shamed by having it said to them: "Your parents were not married in the open light of day." [858]

For a varying length of time X now acts almost as a servant to Y's father. He does not live with her family, but he cuts wood, draws water, and performs other menial tasks. Whenever a member of X's family gives a ceremony, he takes care to give lavish presents to Y's relatives. If it is impossible to hold a sacred rite, X's father is at least expected to invite Y's family to a ceremonial feast, and also to share with them any game that he may kill. Meanwhile, X and Y are not subject to any restrictions as to seeing each other. In theory if they should cohabit it would "spoil" the engagement, but in most cases when this occurs, as it often does, the matter is simply hushed up. [836]

Children whose parents were long engaged are said to be "heavy"; their entry into life having been prepared with careful thought and due ceremony, so that their limbs are clear to travel with success to the position of chief. When such a child is born, the relatives are eager to call their fellow-villagers to confer a name soon after birth, and the infant starts life with this advantage. There is no specific length of time for engagements; if X and Y are the children of influential chiefs, the 584 [858] [553]

584 preliminary agreement may have been made while they were only seven or eight years old, though marriage seldom occurs before the age of seventeen or eighteen. More often the agreement is made when X and Y have passed the age of puberty, and they wait for about two years before marrying.

583 Throughout this period, X's relatives are expected to give at least one feast at which Y's relatives are the guests of honour,
425 and always receive presents. At one of these rites X's father,
553 with the concurrence of his relatives, may mark his approval
[584] of the coming event by bestowing on Y's father, or one of her other relations, an ancestral name from his family myth. This does not become the absolute property of Y's family, since the myth in which it is embodied does not belong to them, unless, of course, they are members of the same ancestral family. It is fitting that a name of this kind be bestowed by the recipient on one of Y's children, or returned to X's family a few generations later by a return marriage. If this is not done, in course of time the designation is apt to be regarded by Y's family as their own. If there are no children, Y's relatives should give back the name to X's
[627] family, but there are many instances of feuds caused by failure
[773] to do so. According to mythology, prerogatives may sometimes be given outright, without thought of their use by the resultant children, or of their being restored by return marriages. It is claimed that the people of the Kimsquit River
[648] have, through such a present, the inalienable title to use a certain spot in the Kitlobe River for their olachen nets, and likewise the Kitlobe people have an irrevocable right to the Kimsquit name Stáhmy. These two prerogatives were transferred at the beginning of time. At present, anyone bestowing outright his family prerogatives would be considered weak-
[578] minded and the other members of the ancestral family would stremuously object. Considerations of this sort make it desirable to seek a wife within the ranks of the ancestral family.

During the period of engagement, Y's family may present a name, or names, to X's father, with the same conditions as those just described.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NES Bellacoola NES

those just described. The giving of these at this time is not obligatory, nor does it affect the validity of the coming marriage. It is merely a mark of friendly feeling between the two groups of relatives, and, by adding to the importance of the event, increases the potential strength of the unborn children. 583

If either X or Y should die during the period of engagement, the presents, or their equivalent, must be returned to the donors. No formal methods are employed to ensure this; but the force of public opinion suffices to compel a man to do that which is proper; in fact, he is anxious to do so. If Y should die, an effort is made to replace her with a sister, cousin, or other near relative, so that the friendly relations entered upon by the two families may not be lost. The gifts mutually given by the two families may be returned and re-donated or the substitute simply takes Y's place without further arrangement. Sometimes, in spite of the wishes of their parents and the elaborate rites carried out, either X or Y breaks the engagement by going to live with somebody else. It is then a mark of pride for the family of the offender to return the gifts they have received, and almost equally a mark of honour for the aggrieved party to give back what has been bestowed upon them, in order to demonstrate how little value they place on the possession of goods. 584 [583] [626] [154] [583]

Though a lengthy engagement is desirable, it may be curtailed. If, for example, one of X's relatives should die before the usual period has elapsed, Y's father may suggest an immediate wedding. He knows that X's family will have heavy expenses in connection with the burial and mourning rites, hence it is courteous to offer a quick marriage with the financial advantages accruing to them at the ceremony. In this case, X either does not work at all for Y's family, or for only a short time. Moreover, if Y reaches marriageable age without her father receiving suitable proposals, he can himself take the initiative by consulting the parents of an eligible young man. If the suggestion is agreeable, the engagement is announced in the manner already described, and the marriage takes place [764]

McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

584 as soon as possible. Though strictly legal, and commonly practised even long ago, this is not considered a desirable preliminary, since the children lack the strength which would have been theirs if their parents had been long engaged. In recent 178 years the custom of short engagements has become popular, 584 though the older Bella Coola feel resentment, saying that the woman is simply "bought" with goods or money at the actual wedding. The return of such sums in due course does not compensate for the omission of the lengthy period of engagement. A few years ago a powerful chief even "bought" husbands for his grand-daughters. His influence was so great that by bestowing large sums on the families of the youths they accepted the young women as wives. The girls in question were desirable in every way, according to Bella Coola standards, but by marrying without a long engagement and suitable presents the husbands, and their families, failed to live up to the dignity of their ancestry. These are breakings down of the ancient rites, and as such are lamented by the older people.

•583 Sometimes, despite the wishes of their parents, a boy and 584 girl announce their desire to marry by living together. After much storming, the parents usually decide to make the best of a bad business by performing the marriage rites as soon as possible and by lavish expenditure on them to lessen the impediment placed against the future offspring by lack of long engagement of their parents. But such a child can never be [858] called an ālqim, which has the significance of something good that has long been sought for, such as a smoothed-grained tree that carpenters like. It will thus be seen that the marriage ceremony must be carried out, irrespective of whether or not it has been preceded by a lengthy period of engagement in which the first proposal was made by the boy's family, by a shorter one in which the girl's family took the initiative, or by no period of engagement whatever. These rites can now be described.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

567 ceremony usually consisted simply of the man and woman
588 living together. In theory, this prevented the children from ever obtaining a name or other prerogative embodied in the ancestral myth of the free-born parent, and an effort was always made to conceal from them the details of the ancestral family's origin myth. But, as already described in the section dealing with slaves, the expenditure of valuable presents served to eradicate, or at least to cover, the blot. If the child succeeded in giving many potlatches, the stain was generally forgotten. On the other hand, if the child of a slave married to a free man was not "washed," he could always be shamed by a reminder of the disgrace of his parents' wedding.

682 In case of murder, the son or other near relative of the
[583] victim sometimes accepts a daughter or other member of the offender's family instead of exacting blood revenge. The bride
[627] is delivered to her husband with valuable goods "to wash away the blood," but these never suffice entirely to remove the disgrace from her or her children. The latter may inherit names and prerogatives from their father, but even if they attain to the position of chiefs, they can always be put to shame by reference to their mother's marriage as an atonement for murder. Of course the influence of a great chief makes it impolitic to refer to his ancestry, and there are a few instances of men having reached such a position of eminence that the blot
[554] has been practically forgotten. The wife's family must continue to give presents to the husband for years after marriage, otherwise her lot is unenviable indeed, and her children have the status of the unwashed offspring of a slave and a free-man. In some cases a marriage of this type is entered upon years after a murder, if a son or other descendant wishes to end the anxiety of constantly expecting blood revenge.

REPURCHASE OF THE WIFE

556 Repurchase of a wife is the necessary consequence of every 583 reputable Bella Coola marriage. It is assumed that the pre-

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

sents given by X's relatives up to the time of the wedding have exceeded in value those which they have received. Later, whenever, and as often as X gives a potlatch, Y's relatives are expected to rebuy her from her husband. Although this is the expression used by the Bella Coola, it has only a ceremonial significance, since Y remains X's wife. 556 583

Whenever X intimates that he is going to give a potlatch, Y and her relatives begin to hoard goods irrespective of whether or not children have been born. Their value is unregulated by custom, although the individuals concerned always try to give as much as they can; usually X does not know exactly how much will be provided until their actual delivery. Moreover, this is the occasion most preferred by the relatives of a wife to present to her husband ancestral names or other prerogatives embodied in origin myths. The exact rights of X with respect to such gifts have already been defined so need not be repeated here. Even if Y has taken an ancient name to her husband when she was married, she may bring him another when repurchased. This is an event of even greater importance to a woman than marriage, so no effort is spared to add to the dignity of the occasion.

On the second night of a potlatch Y's father announces what prerogatives he proposes to grant to X. These may include the right to a certain totem-pole design, the carving of a spoon, a painting for the wall of the house, or any other element embodied in the origin myth. These privileges are displayed by X at the coming potlatch. If, as is usual, Y's father wishes to give his son-in-law an ancestral name, it is announced on this occasion, and is the designation by which X is known during the ceremony. It is always said that such a name is so "heavy," in the sense of "so important" that it must be "dragged across" to her husband by Y. Kusiut names are commonly transferred as presents, but without any public bestowal, and one or two instances are known of the similar acquisition of sisaok prerogatives and whistles; it was in this way that Potlas was able to import sisaok ritual from Bella Bella. After announcing the 425 556 583 [553]

556 prerogatives he is transmitting, Y's father usually takes the 583 opportunity of stating that he wishes to hunt on X's hunting-
[425] grounds, or fish in his fishing-grounds. Permission is never refused, though it is only for the period of the potlatch. Since Y's father is to assist X, it is considered fitting to grant him facilities for obtaining pelts and food.

It is on the afternoon of the second day of the potlatch that the goods are delivered. They serve six purposes, which can be described separately, although the Bella Coola usually think of them as being too closely associated for division.

(1) They increase the dignity, influence, and prestige of the donors. This theme needs no further elaboration. When X later gives these presents to his foreign guests, he announces the person from whom he has received them and in this way knowledge of the manner in which Y's relatives have upheld the dignity of the marriage is spread far and wide, to their intense gratification.

(2) They help X to rise to a position of influence in the community by the credit which comes to him from their later distribution. Though a man may acquire goods in various ways, the Bella Coola affirm that without contributions from his wife's relatives no man can become a chief.

(3) They validate the transmission of names, or other prerogatives, taken by Y to her husband. Even presents given [606] directly from father-in-law to son-in-law are always said to have been taken by the daughter to her husband.

(4) Indirectly, they increase the prestige of the children,
[554] either born at that time or who may appear later. None of the goods used for repurchasing their mother can actually be used for their benefit, but the whole rite gives them strength to succeed in life. A child whose mother has not been repurchased is said to be unable to walk, as if his legs were powerless; he lacks intelligence, and the ability to prosper. From the [578] petty quarrels of childhood until old age, a person is proud to recall the number of times his mother was rebought, and to thrust this statement in the teeth of those less fortunate.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

(5) They govern Y's status in this world. When women quarrel, as they often do, the most common boast to shame a less wealthy rival is a reminder of the number of times the speaker was repurchased and the value of the goods used. 556 583 [578]

"I can sit down on fifteen canoes," or "I am carried by five slaves," says the angry woman, mentioning whatever goods were used for her repurchase.

(6) Finally, these goods serve a more definite purpose in obtaining for Y a name, or names, of which the value is directly proportionate to the expenditure, precisely as the importance of a chief's designation depends on the goods used to validate it. [553]

As with men's names, some women's appellations were given by Ālquntām to the first arrivals; others were created on this earth with regard to peculiar events, and still others are names which can be used either by men or women. Theoretically, the dignity of the first type of name is greater than either of the others, but in practice the importance of the owner depends on the number of times she has bought herself from her husband; the principles governing the rank of women are thus the same as those already described for men. The term yetsalt, applied to a woman who has many times rebought herself and so reached a position of eminence, is the feminine equivalent to stāltumx. The creation of women's names in reference to personal characteristics or incidents connected with their married life is more common than similar creations for men. The ritual of the bestowal of a name on Y, here given, was omitted from the description of the potlatch in order to lessen the complexity of that ceremony. It will be remembered that on the afternoon of the second day of the potlatch Y's relatives appear outside X's house, carrying valuable presents. 551 556 583 [554] [562] 553 556 583

The announcer calls out that Y's father has come to give "food" to X and his relatives. By food, presents are meant, which are the return, with interest, of the gifts given by X's relatives on various occasions. The giver is announced, for other relatives than Y's father contribute, and to whom the

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

553 present is made. The recipient may either be X himself or
556 one of his relatives who has conferred a gift on one of Y's 583 family. The goods are taken inside, counted, displayed, and the same announcement made. These presents are given away by X the same evening, so that the only practical advantage that he receives is that the ultimate recipients make their returns, if any, to him. He makes no recompense to Y's relatives for these.

[537] A fluent orator next speaks on behalf of Y's father to the following effect:

"Please, ye people, listen to my words. This is an important occasion, hearken to what I have to say. Long ago our first ancestors were married, as X and Y have been, and it is fitting that we should make the name ..... live again in Y. Three years [or as long as the name has been dormant] it has been dead, as if living with the ghosts beneath the earth. Now it shall stand up again in Y; henceforth we use it for her. Come forth ..... [using Y's new name], your father rebuys you from X for fifty blankets [for example]."

Y may be anywhere; the statement "come forth" is merely symbolical. The fifty blankets are piled outside the house and the spectators, of whom many have gathered to witness the transaction, know that that number of blankets has been given with reference to that name. In some cases the wife is rebought three, four, or even more times for one name, either repeatedly by her father, or successively by her father and other relatives, or several names may be acquired by the different repurchasings. For instance, at one potlatch not many years ago a woman obtained the names Łäliäks, Xwelbon, Smaien·a, and Aiksamka. As with men, some women prefer to have one very strong name, rather than diffuse their importance over a number. In this particular case the four designations were received from different relatives. At each repurchase the call is raised:

"Come forth ..... your brother [uncle, or whatever relative it may be] rebuys you from X for ....."

1: McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

In one case where an orphan woman, without relatives, 553 repurchased herself by her own arduous labours, the announce- 556
ment was made: 583

"Y's belt has come to rebuy her."

The reference was to the manner in which she had looped up her clothing with a belt when working. If Y's father should die after amassing goods to repurchase her, they are used for the purpose intended and the announcement is:

"Y's father's anus has come to rebuy her."

The ancestral family descended from the first settlers at Snulle·tl have the prerogative of singing a special song as they [424] rebuy one of their daughters. This was used by their first [533] ancestors on a like occasion. The theme is:

"I, I, I am the highest of you all. No one of you is capable of doing what I can accomplish. You all live on what I void."

The significance of this last sentence is that the village of Snulle·tl is farthest up the Bella Coola River. Its inhabitants [186] used to claim that the people of the other villages lived on the refuse which they threw into the river, a source of pride to them.

After announcing the various relatives who have rebought Y, the presents are counted and carried into X's house. The statement concerning their number, who has given them, and for what purpose, is repeated to the foreign guests there assembled, and they are then piled indiscriminately in a large heap for future distribution. At this juncture X calls out:

"Come in, come in," as though he were welcoming arrivals from a distance.

Y's relatives enter, and the ritual of the potlatch continues in the manner already described. The origin myth in which Y's new name is embodied is related in considerable detail, especially its recent history, that is, by whom it was last used and any pertinent items connected with its transmission. If she has received several names from different myths, each is similarly expounded.

As has been said, many women's names have been created 551
553

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

her husband's critics by taking this name for herself when she rebought herself from him. 551 578

Nu'aos, "The Inhospitable One." Her husband received this reputation owing to his wife's manners, so she advertised what had been said about him.

Nupłätlsikän, "Heedlessly Deaf." This woman's mother-in-law claimed that she deliberately failed to hear what she was told to do, and applied the above epithet to her. The daughter-in-law confounded her by taking it as her own name. [606]

When a name of this type is assumed it is always announced when, where, and for what purpose it was first created. 553

A description has already been given of the actual ritual by which X bestows the goods acquired from the repurchase of Y, but it is necessary to enlarge on the prohibition against their use for the direct benefit of one of the children of the couple. The theory is that the goods bind the marriage contract and express in a practical and lofty form the kindly sentiments with which Y's relatives regard her husband, and the bond between the two families, hence they must be used solely for the benefit of him and his relatives. A man usually applies these goods to initiate the children of his brothers or sisters into the ranks of the sisaok or kusiut. It is unthinkable for goods to be delivered without an exposition of Y's family's glories, but if this should ever take place, there would be no difficulty in applying them to the direct benefit of her children. When used, for example, to make a child of X's brother a sisaok, he is a living testimony of the noble way in which Y's relatives have done that which is fitting for the family of her husband. Due to accidents in announcing and storing of presents, it sometimes happens that those obtained by the repurchasing of Y are used for the benefit of her own children. Unless this error is corrected, the child could always be shamed by having it said: 556 583 [558]

"You are a mere nobody. The goods expended in the

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

556 repurchase of your mother have become nothing beneath your 583 feet."

When such an accident occurs, the relatives of X take some [558] future occasion to give presents to validate his child, with the announcement:

"The goods used from the repurchase of his mother have become nothing beneath his feet. We hereby supply that deficiency."

Thus it is demonstrated that the relatives of both parents are interested in his welfare, so that his path is clear before him.

553 Many women are only repurchased once, but an effort is 556 made to do this frequently since the more times, the greater 583 her prestige. After several repurchasings it is felt that the names and other prerogatives "dragged across" by Y have become valueless. But since new names have been taken to her husband on each occasion, the marks of friendship between the two families are still plain. Then it is that those first transmitted can be revived by relatives of Y, unless, of course, X has validated them for his children. If there is only one repurchasing, the names remain the definite property of X. This is not a clearly formulated law, merely a sentiment that the earlier names have been covered by those later given, and that accordingly Y's relatives, having done what was proper, can now use the titles once more. There is a constant interchange of names and privileges between families related by marriage.

556 It is virtually impossible to over-estimate the importance
583 of this rite of repurchase among the Bella Coola, one of the few customs preserved tenaciously amid the ruins of their [182] ancient culture. The writer was forcibly struck with the following instance which occurred while he was in Bella Coola:

About fifteen years before, a young man and woman had married with due formality. After three children had been [586] born, the mother took to drink and vice until her husband at last repudiated her, retaining possession of the children. The woman, weakened by disease, divorced by her husband, and

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

looked upon with contempt by her family, was yet determined that nothing she had done should ruin her children's chances in life. Accordingly she donated $300 to her ex-husband to rebuy herself. Marriage is accepted as a matter of course, but to be many times repurchased is the goal of every ambitious woman. In Täl·io the custom prevails of depicting on the rocks the number of coppers paid for repurchasing a wife. Thus her fame is displayed to all. 556 583 [184] [532]

It is somewhat difficult for a white man to realize what a privilege the family of a wife considers it to repurchase her from her husband. If the latter is unwilling to give a potlatch, his relatives-in-law may urge him to do so, and if he still declines to exert himself they take the drastic step of inviting their fellow-villagers to assemble in his house where, with these guests as witnesses, the wife's relatives give presents to her husband and his relations. They may make this presentation at any gathering where they are assured of a large audience. In so doing the donors have demonstrated their proper sentiments, in spite of the inertness of the husband.

The assistance which the relatives of a wife have given her husband is a matter about which they can boast for the rest of their lives, a fact impressed upon the writer by listening to a quarrel between two Bella Coola men. One of them owned a horse and waggon which the other had hired to move some goods. The latter became very angry, claiming that the former had overcharged him and must be poor and greedy to be so eager to acquire money. The teamster, thus deeply insulted, silenced the other man by reminding him that the only reason he was wealthy was by means of the goods used to repurchase his, the teamster's, sister from her husband, brother of the man with whom he was disputing. To the observer the dispute was made more interesting by the fact that both the husband and wife had been dead for at least fifteen years, but their families had not ceased to remember the financial obligations connected with the marriage. 556 583 578

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

556 A man who is giving a ceremony of any kind can offer few greater insults to his wife's relatives than omission to ask their assistance. The 583 following is a good instance of such an insult:

578 About 1900 a man and woman were married and had three children. Then the mother died, before being repurchased from her husband. In 602 addition, the husband had assisted his wife's father when one of his younger children had died; so that it was most fitting that the wife's relatives should contribute to any ceremony given by the husband. Four years later the husband proposed to marry once more, and to have the wedding occur at a potlatch. But on the day of xlāstwm, he insulted the relatives of his dead wife by failing to invite them. The cause of the feud was not disclosed, but the husband increased it by again failing to invite her family when, during the potlatch, they should have rebought her for the benefit of his young relatives about to be initiated into the ranks of the sisook. The father of the dead woman came forward uninvited with a large present for each, saying in effect:

"I, too, have a right to contribute to add prestige to my daughter and her children."

In this way he defeated the wiles of his son-in-law who had hoped to shame his father-in-law by the failure of the latter to contribute to his potlatch. The son-in-law endeavoured to excuse himself by saying that his late wife's relatives had not assisted for so long that he thought they would not wish to do so. This retort further incensed the father of the dead woman so that next day he and his wife publicly gave the donor of the potlatch $300 "to make clean where we sit."

This somewhat lengthy description has been necessary to explain the important part which the repurchase of wives plays in the lives of the Bella Coola; it is one of the fundamentals of society and is, therefore, worthy of attention.

DISSOLUTION OF MARRIAGE

768 Either death or divorce can terminate marriage. The de-
[586] cease of a wife is an unfortunate affair, quite apart from the grief which it may cause her husband. Two families have been brought into peculiarly close relations through her, and now the bond itself has snapped; delicate financial arrangements have been undertaken, and it is not easy to settle these without ill-feeling, particularly if the alliance was a return marriage. If no child has been born, and no repurchasing of the wife

764 worthy of record that his wishes were scrupulously obeyed.
159 During the morning he was visited by the singers and other chiefs to discuss details of the coming ceremonial.

764 Meanwhile Samuel King had been summoned from his logging-camp. He wished to show his own grief, and also his 159 sorrow that the union between his family and the Schooners, forged by his marriage to Jessie, should be terminated. No 584 children had been born to cement the bond. He consulted his brother and sister, who agreed with him that a marriage between his daughter, by a former wife, and George Nelson would be desirable. The girl was consulted and raised no objections.
[769] Samuel then addressed Captain Schooner who was favourably disposed, so it was decided that this ceremony should take
*[556] place in connection with the memorial potlatch. It would be a real, not a fictitious marriage, as the girl had reached adolescence several years previously.

764 Another visitor to Captain Schooner that morning was 159 Joe Williams. Several years earlier, when he had given a ceremony in honour of two of his children who had died, Captain Schooner had contributed $100 as "A Blanket for George Nelson's Wife." This was really part of the marriage
•[583] transaction, although deferred for a number of years after the actual time of the wedding. This sum had been divided as follows: $20 to Joe Williams; $20 to Mrs. Joe Williams; $10 to Mrs. George Nelson; $10 to her brother; $20 to Lame Charlie; and $20 to Mrs. Lame Charlie. Joe consulted the recipients and found that all were willing to repay their indebtedness at this time. Captain Schooner did not ask for it, but Joe was glad of the opportunity to do the proper thing at the right time and thus rise in popular estimation. He and his relatives decided to return $150, a sum which he mentioned to Captain Schooner that morning.

[583] Joe Williams, his wife, and Mrs. George Nelson also decided to take advantage of the gathering to rebuy the last named from her husband. The fact that they had been separated for at least a year and that the woman had been living an immoral life did not alter the necessity of rebuying her "to make good the path" of her children. For this purpose they decided to give a copper and a sum of money; it was impossible to learn the exact amount. Joe told Captain Schooner of their intention. 764 159 [583]

About noon the body was brought in a canoe from the cannery in its closed coffin and lifted ashore at a convenient spot near the cemetery. Those manning the canoe were young men who happened to be at the cannery, irrespective of whether or not they were related to Jessie. The coffin was laid on a grassy place and Captain Schooner seated himself beside it. People were passing and repassing, some sat down for a time, then moved off to dinner. Occasionally, a woman would sit and wail, the most constant being Reuben's married daughter; Captain Schooner moved around talking to his friends amidst the eerie wailing. About 1.30 P.M. everyone in the village had assembled, including a number of Carrier Indians, anxious to see the sight. Captain Schooner withdrew to his house after asking Bobby Nebby to summon the chiefs to meet him there. The messenger, who thus acted as herald, went around the gathering whispering to each; in addition to those notified at the cannery the preceding evening he called all the older and most influential Bella Coola, Albert King, Samuel King, Joe Williams, Joshua Moody, Alec Davis, Lame Charlie, Judas, and Nebuchadnezzar. Captain Schooner requested the last named, an important chief, to take charge of the ceremony. At this time Samuel King told Nebuchadnezzar, who informed the others, what had been arranged for his daughter and they agreed that it was good. It was tacitly assumed that George Nelson would be delighted; probably he had been on friendly terms with the girl for some time. Joe Williams also told Nebuchadnezzar the two business propositions that he intended to carry out, the return of the money to Captain Schooner, and the rebuying of his daughter. Nebuchadnezzar informed the people concerned. At this meeting it was decided that various chiefs should speak after the Christian service at the grave. [203] [584] [587]

for the Carriers and other foreigners. The cook began to ladle the rice into basins provided by Captain Schooner; these were taken by some of the younger men who poured helpings into the dishes of the guests. Spoons had been forgotten, and there was delay until these were provided by slivers split from a block of wood for the purpose. Contrary to ancient usage, no attempt was made to serve food to the guests in order of their rank. Men, women, and children were sitting everywhere, the infants kept moving around and crying continually throughout the performance, but no one seemed to be disturbed thereby. 769 556* 264 [178] [852]

When everyone had eaten, Nebuchadnezzar, who had been sitting facing the other singers, beat on the floor to attract attention and then rose to speak. He asked the help of all to make the ceremony a success, and thus assuage the grief of the bereaved relatives. 769 556*

Joe Williams and his daughter had taken their places on the right-hand side of the hall and had requested Willie Mack, a fluent speaker and influential chief, to assist them in announcing the financial transactions. They spread a blanket on the floor on which the bills were counted, and beside this Willie knelt. Joe gave him a sum of money, which was counted and re-counted; Willie then held it up in the vain hope that it could be seen by everyone in the hall. He announced the amount, also that it was to rebuy (the divorced) Mrs. George Nelson from her late husband, and that it would "make clean the place where she sat." A young man delivered the money to George who added it to the general stock for later distribution. Next a copper was produced, held up, and presented to him for the same purpose. Meanwhile Joe, assisted by his mother and other relatives, had been counting the money which they proposed to give to Captain Schooner in settlement of the previously contracted debt. One hundred and fifty dollars were produced and handed to Willie Mack, who held them up and announced that it was in return for the $100 given by Captain Schooner on a previous occasion to Joe Williams, his wife, his son, his daughter, his mother, and his stepfather. The bills 769 556* 583 [537] 769 556*

969 were taken by one of the younger men to Captain Schooner,
4.556 who accepted them without showing either gratitude or the reverse; this return was a matter that concerned the Williams family, not the Schooners. After a short delay, Billy Pollard moved over to the group and spoke to Joe and Willie Mack, [583] to whom he gave $10. The latter stated that this sum, which he held up, and a horse, which was not produced, were being given to George Nelson to rebuy his (divorced) wife. Billy is not related to the woman, but had long been friendly and wished to share in making good the path for her children. This matter had not been previously broached. The choice of [537] Willie Mack as announcer was made merely because he was a fluent speaker and, as a chief, had the necessary self-confidence to act fittingly.

969 After these preliminaries, the main rite was begun. Jim
4.556 Pollard, an eloquent chief unrelated to any of the principals, 537 spoke at some length describing the journey taken by Jessie to visit the scenes of her ancestral myths. He was followed by a Bella Bella chief who happened to be in Bella Coola at the time. In the Chinook jargon he first expressed his sympathy and respect for Captain Schooner because he was carrying out the fitting rites, then asked leave to speak in Bella Bella because he found it difficult to express himself in Chinook. He described the journey which the deceased had taken owing to her membership in the ancestral family of her mother, a Bella Bella woman. No one paid much attention to the speeches; in fact, it was impossible at the back of the hall to hear what was said owing to the chattering and crying of children.

969 After considerable delay, the singers decided it was time to 4.556 sing the first mourning song. It had never before been used, 533 although the composer, Billy Pollard, had prepared it several years earlier and had merely altered the words during the morning after consulting Captain Schooner about his ancestral myths. The singers had learnt text and tune during the rehearsal a few hours before. It was impossible to record it in detail; in outline, it consisted of the words:

and deciding how to divide it. Harry Schooner is neither dominant nor capable, and Andy acted only as clerk, so the actual decision rested with Captain Schooner, Reuben, and George. Daniel Nelson would normally have played a prominent part, but he was absent owing to the illness of his infant daughter. Samuel King joined the group, bringing with him two coppers, two rifles, and a sum of money, and whispered the purpose of this contribution. 769 556* 769 556*

After the usual pause, George Nelson and Captain Schooner, the latter substituting for the absent Dan Nelson, stood up and walked around the hall carrying three coppers and two rifles. Then they returned to their places. 583

Nebuchadnezzar had been asked by Captain Schooner to act as announcer on account of his good voice and self-confidence. He joined the group in the corner to call out whatever they whispered to him. First he stated that one of the coppers just displayed had been given to George Nelson to rebuy from him his wife, Joe Williams' daughter. He explained that the other two, as well as the rifles, were presents from Samuel King, assisted by his brother, Albert, and his sister, Mrs. Alexander Clallaman, to George Nelson in consequence of the latter's marriage to Samuel King's daughter. This arrangement having been initiated by the relatives of the girl, it was fitting that they should give the first presents. [537]

Captain Schooner had first planned to expend $200 to validate the return of his dead daughter. His wife gave him $20 for the purpose, and when Joe Williams returned $150, he decided to use only $100 of his savings, making $270 in all. To this Reuben added $60, Harry $40, and Dan Nelson $40, increasing the total to $410. George contributed what he had received from Joe Williams for the repurchase of the latter's daughter, as well as what Samuel King had just given him. Samuel added to the pile some money belonging to Jessie,[18] 769 556*

[18] The writer could not learn why this money had not been destroyed with her other possessions. The reason may have been that the Bella Coola knew that, though a potlatch was illegal, the goods of a dead person could be distributed and by doing this at a ceremony they hoped for no interference from the law.

581 Confidently believing that he has descended from ancestors
[858] who came to this earth in the beginning of time, a Bella Coola wishes to have his children firmly established in the path of his forbears. This can be accomplished only with the aid of a suitable mother. It follows that marriage is not primarily a matter of affection, but of the ancestral eligibility of the contracting parties.

CHOICE OF MATE

584 Since the initiative for marriage is taken by the man in 581 almost all cases, it will be convenient and proper to describe the factors which enter into the search for a wife, remembering that the converse govern the decision of the woman and her relatives. The choice of the woman who is to be the mother of the children who will carry on the traditions of the ancestral family is a matter of too great importance to be entrusted to any young person. Accordingly, while their son is yet a child, his parents often discuss who would be a suitable wife for him. They view the matter from a strictly business standpoint.
581 Proud of their own ancient lineage, they would not demean themselves by allowing their son to marry a girl who could not trace her ancestry back to the first people, or with one whose forbears had disgraced themselves by marriage with slaves. Instead, it is a matter of pride for parents to have as daughter-in-law the child of a powerful chief. Nor can they choose a 582 woman too closely related to their son. Marriage with a sister, an aunt, a niece, or any first cousin is strictly prohibited. No reason for these laws could be obtained; the Bella Coola consider that it would be "indecent" or unclean so to marry, but have theorized no further about the matter. An adopted child
[597] is regarded in the same light as an own child. The Bella Coola
829 know, and are amused by, the regulation of marriage according [171] to crests among the northern tribes, but practise nothing of the same nature themselves. In fact, marriages usually take place among those who are descended from one ancestor and who have, accordingly, the same crest, though the significance

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

583 at present, though even now it is considered highly desirable.
[178] The sentiment is that already described: the more closely the parents are bound together by ties of common ancestry, the greater will be their children's ceremonial strength. Further, reciprocal alliances of this type obviate all danger of feuds, since return marriages are not required.

582 In recent years it has become fashionable, or socially
178 "smart," with some Bella Coola families to seek wives from 648 unrelated ancestral families, and even from other tribes. It is said that this practice was initiated by Petlus, an important chief who died between 1870 and 1880. He sought foreign marriages on acccount of the prerogatives which were brought as dowers by his wives, and considered that such rights, transmissable to his children, more than compensated for the lack of strength provided by related ancestors. Many have followed his example, with the result that some ancestral families have entirely abandoned the endogamic tendency. Boas (p. 124) has made the same observation. Although this exogamic
[581] principle is directly contrary to that which has already been described, yet it should be noted that each has the same explanation—the search for a wife able to bring most to her as yet unborn children.

● 584 Should the parents consider a foreign woman as wife for 581 their son, then her worth is discussed from every angle. One woman may have the right to good hunting grounds, the family of another may have some valuable nsaak prerogatives, a third some kusiut rites. Anxious thought is put on the relative values of these. One man had heard of the French system of dot, and emphasized strongly how far superior to, and more sensible it was than the Canadian practice. In recent years
[178] the younger Bella Coola have been arranging their own marriages, and the older men lament bitterly that they are influenced only by the beauty and working ability of the girl, not by her real worth, the prerogatives which she can bring to her children.

Although parents consider chiefly the ancestry of their

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

future daughter-in-law, yet they are not entirely oblivious to the girl herself. She must be of about the same age as their son, preferably a year or two older. Should the wife be the younger, it is thought that she ages rapidly until she appears as old as her husband. Boys usually marry at seventeen or eighteen, and it is essential that the woman chosen for wife must have been concealed for at least a year following puberty. Nor is a weakly girl chosen, or one of notoriously bad temper. As their son reaches the age of marriage, his parents usually consult him, though it is not usual for him to gainsay their wishes. A girl who has been leading a notoriously lax life is not desired, though this is most unusual for the daughter of a chief. The feeling is that such a girl would be a faithless and fickle wife, rather than any objection to her sins as such. 584 581 [582]

Realizing the importance of marriage, the parents of a boy discuss and plan the event for years, weighing the relative value of girls whom they think they could obtain for their son. By the time he has reached the age of fourteen or fifteen, they have decided on the most suitable partner, and it then becomes necessary to consult her parents and win their approval. 584

When the parents of the young man (whom it will be convenient to term X) have at last decided on a suitable partner, they next choose an intermediary for the first proposal. In all these discussions the elderly relatives of the parents take a leading part, and especially their own parents if alive. Sometimes X's father himself interviews the father of the girl (here termed Y), at other times he asks some friend to do so. The matter is not supposed to be generally known, and the intermediary goes to Y's father's house, and quietly tells her parents that X's family would like their daughter to become X's wife. This preliminary asking is done unostentatiously, at any time and in any place, and the messenger withdraws after giving his message. In all probability Y's family have already re-

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

584 ceived information of the proposed marriage, but they always plead ignorance, and deliberate for several days. Y's parents and other relatives take part in the discussion, and Y herself may likewise be taken into confidence. Although a daughter has, theoretically, little choice, in practice she exercises a great deal of influence. Her mother and father weigh the suitor's [581] eligibility not only with regard to wealth and ancestral possessions, but consider his character. An immoral young man is not desirable, though neither is one who is impotent.

If Y's relatives agree to the proposal, some one of them informs the intermediary, or X's father, and the young people are considered to be engaged. The fact is supposed to be kept secret for several days, although the news usually becomes known sooner. X's relatives as soon as possible take a number 583 of presents to Y's family. These are given in private, and are 584 termed "secret gifts"; they are said to give strength to the future children. Since no witnesses are present it follows that no social prestige accrues from the transaction. The relatives included in the "family" of either X or Y are not always the same; uncles, aunts, grandparents, may or may not take part in the giving and receiving of presents, the parents alone always do so. Sometimes distant relatives take a leading part in the arrangements, either in hope of receiving valuable gifts, or of obtaining social influence by lavish giving. If X's relatives have reason to believe that Y's family will accept their proposal, several of them may go in company and actually carry the "secret gifts" to Y's house at the time of making the first proposal. Should this be rejected, they merely carry away their goods, and as the affair has been private, no one's vanity is hurt.

The acceptance of "secret gifts" binds the engagement of X and Y, but a few days elapse before this is made public. If 552, X's family is wealthy, his father, or other near relative, pre- 584 sently invites all the inhabitants of the village to his house. 535 The singers, in their usual stations behind the fire, strike up 575 the tune of some kusiut and the owner of the song, thus warned, dances in time to it. Using their own discretion, the musicians proceed to beat out the time for kusiut after kusiut, and each performs. In like fashion they then beat out the tune of one nanak after another, and each member of that society gives his dance. Since none of the supernatural beings is present, the affair is non-sacred. The singers consult with the host as to the number of songs to be used. When they stop at last, X's father, aided by his younger relatives, gives valuable presents [585] of food. No mention of the coming marriage is made, but the rite gives the donor an opportunity of displaying his generosity as a chief and indirectly increases the importance of the wedding because the value of the food will later be remembered in connection with it.

If X's father is very wealthy, he may recall the people for several nights, always providing the same type of entertainment, and always giving food. He uses his own judgment as to the number of such entertainments, but at that which he decides shall be the last, he announces:

"Tomorrow we shall go to Y's father's house."

If X's father does not wish to give away such large quantities of food he may omit the dancing in his own house and make this announcement at a potlatch, a kusiut dance,[5] or any other public gathering. But the more elaborate the ceremonial, the greater is the importance of the marriage in the eyes of the Bella Coola, which in turn increases the strength of the children [858] who may result from it.

On the morning after this declaration, X's father calls to his house those whom he wishes to be witnesses of the alliance that has been planned. These include as many of his relatives and those of his wife as he desires, and often intimate friends. These individuals comprise the group interested, on behalf of X, in the marriage; they provide the goods which are given for him, and receive the presents from the corresponding group of Y's relatives. Anyone having the necessary financial ability

583 is glad of this opportunity to demonstrate it, but a poor man 584 can decline without loss of social esteem.

Carrying presents, the specific value of which is immaterial, they set out for Y's house. Her father, accompanied by his relatives, has been warned and is waiting at the door. A herald, or other eloquent speaker, addresses them on behalf of X's father. He says in effect:

"We do not come secretly or wrongfully to steal something from you. We come with the loftiest intentions. Great is our affection for your child. What we are about to do has long been a practice of our two families [if the two families have intermarried in past generations]; let us do according to our wishes. I am the opening."[6]

Then X's father throws on the ground several stones, representing slaves who will later be given to Y's relatives. These are said to "open the door," that is, to make clear the entrance of X and his relatives into Y's house. There is the added significance that they start upon a clear road the children whom it is hoped will result from the marriage. This thought finds expression in many rites both during engagement and at the wedding ceremony itself. After throwing the stones, X's father gives gifts to Y, to her father, her mother, and to her other relatives assembled. These are of such great value that X's father sometimes almost impoverishes himself, but he knows that though these will never actually be returned, Y's family will be proud to uphold their dignity, and the importance of Y, by equally lavish givings.

Y's father now invites his guests to enter his house, and ushers them to their duly validated seats where the food that has been prepared is served with all solemnity in the usual food-boxes. Then Y's family give presents to X's family, that is to all who have come to share in the marriage. These goods are known as "working clothes"; they are usually of less value

[6] Opening, ebdemsilat. This term is applied to the whole ceremony at Y's house and, like it, has a double significance, as opening the way for the marriage, and clearing the path for the future children.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

than the presents just given by X's relatives, though occasionally they may exceed them. Y's father, or a herald, or an eloquent friend on his behalf, speaks to the following effect: 583 584

"Be bold. Henceforth you will have to work a very long time for us. We will let you know when we need your services."

The significance of this speech lies in the fact that X, and to a certain extent his relatives, are expected to perform almost menial tasks for Y's father during the period of engagement, which has now been duly ratified. X's father and his followers now leave Y's house. It is immaterial whether or not X and Y themselves have been present. It is important that this formal acknowledgment of the engagement should take place during the day; otherwise any children resulting from the marriage could be shamed by having it said to them: "Your parents were not married in the open light of day." [858]

For a varying length of time X now acts almost as a servant to Y's father. He does not live with her family, but he cuts wood, draws water, and performs other menial tasks. Whenever a member of X's family gives a ceremony, he takes care to give lavish presents to Y's relatives. If it is impossible to hold a sacred rite, X's father is at least expected to invite Y's family to a ceremonial feast, and also to share with them any game that he may kill. Meanwhile, X and Y are not subject to any restrictions as to seeing each other. In theory if they should cohabit it would "spoil" the engagement, but in most cases when this occurs, as it often does, the matter is simply hushed up. [836]

Children whose parents were long engaged are said to be "heavy"; their entry into life having been prepared with careful thought and due ceremony, so that their limbs are clear to travel with success to the position of chief. When such a child is born, the relatives are eager to call their fellow-villagers to confer a name soon after birth, and the infant starts life with this advantage. There is no specific length of time for engagements; if X and Y are the children of influential chiefs, the 584 [858] [553]

584 preliminary agreement may have been made while they were only seven or eight years old, though marriage seldom occurs before the age of seventeen or eighteen. More often the agreement is made when X and Y have passed the age of puberty, and they wait for about two years before marrying.

583 Throughout this period, X's relatives are expected to give at least one feast at which Y's relatives are the guests of honour,
425 and always receive presents. At one of these rites X's father,
553 with the concurrence of his relatives, may mark his approval
[584] of the coming event by bestowing on Y's father, or one of her other relations, an ancestral name from his family myth. This does not become the absolute property of Y's family, since the myth in which it is embodied does not belong to them, unless, of course, they are members of the same ancestral family. It is fitting that a name of this kind be bestowed by the recipient on one of Y's children, or returned to X's family a few generations later by a return marriage. If this is not done, in course of time the designation is apt to be regarded by Y's family as their own. If there are no children, Y's relatives should give back the name to X's [627] family, but there are many instances of feuds caused by failure to do so. According to mythology, prerogatives may some-
[773] times be given outright, without thought of their use by the resultant children, or of their being restored by return marriages. It is claimed that the people of the Kimsquit River
[648] have, through such a present, the inalienable title to use a certain spot in the Kitlobe River for their olachen nets, and likewise the Kitlobe people have an irrevocable right to the Kimsquit name Stáhmy. These two prerogatives were transferred at the beginning of time. At present, anyone bestowing outright his family prerogatives would be considered weak-
[578] minded and the other members of the ancestral family would strenuously object. Considerations of this sort make it desirable to seek a wife within the ranks of the ancestral family.

During the period of engagement, Y's family may present a name, or names, to X's father, with the same conditions as those just described.

1:Mc:Dowalth E-5 (1911-1914)948
NEA Bellaccola NEA

those just described. The giving of these at this time is not obligatory, nor does it affect the validity of the coming marriage. It is merely a mark of friendly feeling between the two groups of relatives, and, by adding to the importance of the event, increases the potential strength of the unborn children. 583

If either X or Y should die during the period of engagement, the presents, or their equivalent, must be returned to the donors. No formal methods are employed to ensure this, but the force of public opinion suffices to compel a man to do that which is proper; in fact, he is anxious to do so. If Y should die, an effort is made to replace her with a sister, cousin, or other near relative, so that the friendly relations entered upon by the two families may not be lost. The gifts mutually given by the two families may be returned and re-donated or the substitute simply takes Y's place without further arrangement. Sometimes, in spite of the wishes of their parents and the elaborate rites carried out, either X or Y breaks the engagement by going to live with somebody else. It is then a mark of pride for the family of the offender to return the gifts they have received, and almost equally a mark of honour for the aggrieved party to give back what has been bestowed upon them, in order to demonstrate how little value they place on the possession of goods. 584 [583] [624] [154] [583]

Though a lengthy engagement is desirable, it may be curtailed. If, for example, one of X's relatives should die before the usual period has elapsed, Y's father may suggest an immediate wedding. He knows that X's family will have heavy expenses in connection with the burial and mourning rites, hence it is courteous to offer a quick marriage with the financial advantages accruing to them at the ceremony. In this case, X either does not work at all for Y's family, or for only a short time. Moreover, if Y reaches marriageable age without her father receiving suitable proposals, he can himself take the initiative by consulting the parents of an eligible young man. If the suggestion is agreeable, the engagement is announced in the manner already described, and the marriage takes place [764]

584 as soon as possible. Though strictly legal, and commonly practised even long ago, this is not considered a desirable preliminary, since the children lack the strength which would have been theirs if their parents had been long engaged. In recent
171 years the custom of short engagements has become popular, 584 though the older Bella Coola feel resentment, saying that the woman is simply "bought" with goods or money at the actual wedding. The return of such sums in due course does not compensate for the omission of the lengthy period of engagement. A few years ago a powerful chief even "bought" husbands for his grand-daughters. His influence was so great that by bestowing large sums on the families of the youths they accepted the young women as wives. The girls in question were desirable in every way, according to Bella Coola standards, but by marrying without a long engagement and suitable presents the husbands, and their families, failed to live up to the dignity of their ancestry. These are breakings down of the ancient rites, and as such are lamented by the older people.

583 Sometimes, despite the wishes of their parents, a boy and 584 girl announce their desire to marry by living together. After much storming, the parents usually decide to make the best of a bad business by performing the marriage rites as soon as possible and by lavish expenditure on them to lessen the impediment placed against the future offspring by lack of long engagement of their parents. But such a child can never be [858] called as dipiw, which has the significance of something good that has long been sought for, such as a smoothed-grained tree that carpenters like. It will thus be seen that the marriage ceremony must be carried out, irrespective of whether or not it has been preceded by a lengthy period of engagement in which the first proposal was made by the boy's family, by a shorter one in which the girl's family took the initiative, or by no period of engagement whatever. These rites can now be described.

MARRIAGE RITES

Y's family decide when the period of engagement shall be terminated. Although it is considered undignified for X or his relatives to hurry them in this matter, there is always a certain amount of urging. Y's father has strong reasons for procrastination. A long engagement strengthens the status of the children whom his daughter may bear, and besides, he frequently receives presents from X's relatives. As Y's relatives will have to bear the heavier part of the expenses of the wedding, it may be necessary for them to delay it for years while saving the requisite goods. The ceremony may take place at any time of the year. Foreign guests are occasionally invited, but usually only the members of X's and Y's village are present. If the marriage should be with the child of a foreign chief his relatives and friends are present to take part. When Y's relations decide that they are ready, they choose the actual day after consultation with X's family, though the assumption is that Y's father merely informs X's father of the date. 584 585

It is incumbent on X's family to proclaim the event on the day preceding the ceremony. In the late afternoon his father sends a herald through the village calling out: 585 209

"Qwimap, ye chiefs! Qwimap, ye wives of chiefs! Qwimap, ye commoners!"

The actual meaning of qwimap is unknown, though it is well understood to be an invitation to gather for the announcement of a wedding. In conjunction with the summons, X's ancestral name is used, although all in the village are probably well aware of what is about to take place. It is noteworthy that at a marriage the guests, as well as the participants, are called by the ancestral names, as opposed to the kwiat names by which individuals who own such are generally known. Red colouring is much in evidence at weddings; heralds smear their faces with red paint and the guests similarly tint themselves. They wear collars, wristlets, and anklets of undyed cedar-bark, and cover themselves with eagle down. [551] 585 [551] [302] [301]

764 worthy of record that his wishes were scrupulously obeyed.
159 During the morning he was visited by the singers and other chiefs to discuss details of the coming ceremonial.

Meanwhile Samuel King had been summoned from his 764 logging-camp. He wished to show his own grief, and also his 159 sorrow that the union between his family and the Schooners, forged by his marriage to Jessie, should be terminated. No
● 584 children had been born to cement the bond. He consulted his brother and sister, who agreed with him that a marriage between his daughter, by a former wife, and George Nelson would be desirable. The girl was consulted and raised no objections. Samuel then addressed Captain Schooner who was favourably [769] disposed, so it was decided that this ceremony should take
* [356] place in connection with the memorial potlatch. It would be a real, not a fictitious marriage, as the girl had reached adolescence several years previously.

764 Another visitor to Captain Schooner that morning was 159 Joe Williams. Several years earlier, when he had given a ceremony in honour of two of his children who had died, Captain Schooner had contributed $100 as "A Blanket for George Nelson's Wife." This was really part of the marriage
[583] transaction, although deferred for a number of years after the actual time of the wedding. This sum had been divided as follows: $20 to Joe Williams; $20 to Mrs. Joe Williams; $10 to Mrs. George Nelson; $10 to her brother; $20 to Lame Charlie; and $20 to Mrs. Lame Charlie. Joe consulted the recipients and found that all were willing to repay their indebtedness at this time. Captain Schooner did not ask for it, but Joe was glad of the opportunity to do the proper thing at the right time and thus rise in popular estimation. He and his relatives decided to return $150, a sum which he mentioned to Captain Schooner that morning.

[583] Joe Williams, his wife, and Mrs. George Nelson also decided to take advantage of the gathering to rebuy the last named from her husband. The fact that they had been separated for at least a year and that the woman had been living an immoral life did not alter the necessity of rebuying her "to make good the path" of her children. For this purpose they decided to give a copper and a sum of money; it was impossible to learn the exact amount. Joe told Captain Schooner of their intention. 764 159 [583]

About noon the body was brought in a canoe from the cannery in its closed coffin and lifted ashore at a convenient spot near the cemetery. Those manning the canoe were young men who happened to be at the cannery, irrespective of whether or not they were related to Jessie. The coffin was laid on a grassy place and Captain Schooner seated himself beside it. People were passing and repassing, some sat down for a time, then moved off to dinner. Occasionally, a woman would sit and wail, the most constant being Reuben's married daughter; Captain Schooner moved around talking to his friends amidst the eerie wailing. About 1.30 P.M. everyone in the village had assembled, including a number of Carrier Indians, anxious to see the sight. Captain Schooner withdrew to his house after asking Bobby Nebby to summon the chiefs to meet him there. The messenger, who thus acted as herald, went around the gathering whispering to each; in addition to those notified at the cannery the preceding evening he called all the older and most influential Bella Coola, Albert King, Samuel King, Joe Williams, Joshua Moody, Alec Davis, Lame Charlie, Judas, and Nebuchadnezzar. Captain Schooner requested the last named, an important chief, to take charge of the ceremony. At this time Samuel King told Nebuchadnezzar, who informed the others, what had been arranged for his daughter and they agreed that it was good. It was tacitly assumed that George Nelson would be delighted; probably he had been on friendly terms with the girl for some time. Joe Williams also told Nebuchadnezzar the two business propositions that he intended to carry out, the return of the money to Captain Schooner, and the rebuying of his daughter. Nebuchadnezzar informed the people concerned. At this meeting it was decided that various chiefs should speak after the Christian service at the grave. [203] [584] [537]

844 fessional midwives. The child is washed in warm water. For ten days
[846] the mother must remain in this hut. Father and mother must not go [825] near the room for a year (according to Nuuk'sla'sta, for ten days), else the salmon would take offence.

553 The child is soon given its first name. On this occasion the whole [852] tribe is invited to a feast, the name is made public, and the guests receive small presents. The child retains this name until it becomes a member [556] of the Ka'siôt, when it is given its Ka'siôt name. This ceremony takes place after puberty has been reached. About this period the young man gives his first potlatch and assumes the Qa'mtsiza name.

881 When a girl reaches puberty she must stay in the shed which serves as her bedroom, where she has a separate fireplace. She is not allowed to descend to the main part of the house, and must not sit by the fire of the family. For four days she must remain motionless in a sitting posture. She fasts during the daytime, but is allowed a little food and drink at a very early hour in the morning. After this term she may leave her room, but only through a separate opening. She must not yet
[292] come to the main room. When leaving the house she wears a large hat, [821] which protects her face against the rays of the sun. It is believed that if the sun should shine on her face her eyes would suffer. She may pick berries on the hills, but must not come near the river or sea for a whole year. She must not eat fresh salmon, else she would lose [262] her senses, or her mouth would be transformed into a long beak. She [261] must not chew gum or eat snow (see Fifth Report of Committee, 1889, p. 838).

● 584 If a young man wishes to marry a girl he goes, surrounded by his friends, to the house of the girl's father and states his intention. His [431] friends carry food and presents, and if the father accepts the suit he sends out a young man, who receives the food and presents and carries them into the house. Sometimes the father does not accept the offer at once. In such cases the young man may repeat the same ceremony until he is finally rejected or accepted. After the time of the marriage has [527] been agreed upon between the contracting parties, and the day preceding the marriage has arrived, the young man invites all the people to a feast, during which he states that he is to be married on the following day. He asks a number of men, generally from twenty to thirty, and four women to assist him. On the following forenoon they assemble, and [302] accompany the bridegroom to the girl's house. They sing outside, and 585 four of the men dance. All of them have their faces painted red. Finally they enter, and the bridegroom gives a large amount of property to the girl's father. Then the girl leaves her parents and goes to the bridegroom, bringing him also a large amount of property which has been [431] given to her for this purpose by her parents and relatives. He in turn gives her blankets and other apparel of the best quality, and distributes presents among her relatives. This is repeated after some time. All he has given to his bride and her relatives is repaid to him with interest. A rich girl will repay twice or three times the amount given by the man. At the time of the marriage the bride's father may promise the groom to give him his Sisan'kH secrets as soon as the pair have their first child.
[851] The children may belong to the father's or mother's gens, as the parents may choose.

586 In case of a separation the wife refunds the amount of purchase-money. The children may stay with either parent, or part of them may

208 in such a way that the contents dribble over the recipient;
522 sometimes, though able to catch the dish, a herald may 556 deliberately allow the sticky pulp to cover him. The humour of this is increased by the fact that guests at potlatches always receive their food in a ceremonious manner.

208 Though one of a herald's duties is to act as buffoon, his 556 position is only very slightly derogatory. In the beginning of time, Raven himself did not hesitate to act in this capacity on [773] many occasions. Ever since, the post has usually been occupied by relatives of chiefs, especially by those who are unable to give potlatches. In some cases the position is sought by ambitious young men, willing to endure the slight loss of dignity for the emoluments. Since the basic principle of every Bella Coola ceremony is that the donor must recompense those who have assisted him, heralds are always lavishly rewarded. At potlatches especially, chiefs remember their dependence upon the heralds, and shower presents upon them. One who has allowed himself to be spattered with liquid food to amuse the guests, is suitably compensated, but in any case he receives presents for summoning and seating the guests and for interrupting the speeches. The same principle holds good in all other ceremonies. An elderly informant related that once in his younger days he had been dancing a ɬsaok dance, when two heralds remarked that the ground on which he was dancing was dirty, meaning, that it had not been made clean by the distribution of sufficient presents to justify his dance. His mother at once gave the heralds two muskets, valuable articles in those days, to clear her son's path. These belonged to the informant, who knew nothing about the transaction until it had been completed, but he accepted as a matter of course the necessity of giving presents to heralds. If the seat on which a chief is sitting should break, presents must be given to heralds, and if a kusiat should fall when a herald is watching, the latter [622] receives gifts. At the marriage of a chief's son, a herald can 585 claim and remove any of the clothing of the bridegroom or his associates. Above all other occasions, when a young chief is

MARRIAGE RITES

Y's family decide when the period of engagement shall be terminated. Although it is considered undignified for X or his relatives to hurry them in this matter, there is always a certain amount of urging. Y's father has strong reasons for procrastination. A long engagement strengthens the status of the children whom his daughter may bear, and besides, he frequently receives presents from X's relatives. As Y's relatives will have to bear the heavier part of the expenses of the wedding, it may be necessary for them to delay it for years while saving the requisite goods. The ceremony may take place at any time of the year. Foreign guests are occasionally invited, but usually only the members of X's and Y's village are present. If the marriage should be with the child of a foreign chief his relatives and friends are present to take part. When Y's relatives decide that they are ready, they choose the actual day after consultation with X's family, though the assumption is that Y's father merely informs X's father of the date.

It is incumbent on X's family to proclaim the event on the day preceding the ceremony. In the late afternoon his father sends a herald through the village calling out:

"Qwimap, ye chiefs! Qwimap, ye wives of chiefs! Qwimap, ye commoners!"

The actual meaning of qwimap is unknown, though it is well understood to be an invitation to gather for the announcement of a wedding. In conjunction with the summons, X's ancestral name is used, although all in the village are probably well aware of what is about to take place. It is noteworthy that at a marriage the guests, as well as the participants, are called by the ancestral names, as opposed to the kuaist ones by which individuals who own such are generally known. Red colouring is much in evidence at weddings; heralds smear their faces with red paint and the guests similarly tint themselves. They wear collars, wristlets, and anklets of undyed cedar-bark, and cover themselves with eagle down.

585 In the gathering dusk all assemble in X's house; Y's relatives attend or not as they wish. X's father would feel insulted if anyone else should stay away without a valid excuse, but in point of fact everyone is eager for an evening's entertainment. The singers take their accustomed places behind the fire and the guests arrange themselves in the house without reference to rank. The musicians strike up the kusiut song of anyone present, and the person so indicated dances. The first tune used is frequently that of X's father, and then that of his mother, but there is no fixed rule about this. The singers [539] house and beat out tune after tune, and guest after guest dances, but, since none of the supernatural beings is present, the affair is of a non-sacred nature. After exhausting the most popular kusiut songs, the musicians beat out the susaok songs of many of the guests who, in succession, dance to them; the songs of shamans are used in like fashion. Sometimes the singers continue until everyone present has danced, at other times they curtail the ceremony, as they think fit. When they decide to stop, they intimate this to X's father, who superintends the distribution to the guests of whatever kind of food has been provided.

During the meal, a fluent speaker stands up and expounds 537 on behalf of X's father the ancestral myth in which his son's 585 ancestral name is embodied. Sometimes X's father acts as his own orator, but usually a herald is called upon. Only sufficient [203] details are given to show the importance of X. The myth may either be one of the most ancient type dealing with the first settlement of this earth, or one of later date describing the exploits of X's famous ancestors; but in either case, as shown by the examples given in the last chapter, each contains an account of a marriage. It is always known, although not generally described, that at each of these several dancers performed, their number varying between two and eighteen. The orator, when outlining the myth, stresses this part of it, and always announces how many danced at that time; with the statement that there will be a like number on the morrow. In the same manner the fluent speaker outlines a myth belonging to the ancestral family of X's mother, again with emphasis on the dancers used by her ancestors. X, as a member of both ancestral families, can combine his rights from both sides, but it is customary for him to use no more than five or six performers. Should X have no claim to this privilege from either mother or father, an almost unthinkable situation, he is able to borrow the prerogative of using some from friends. The sentiment on which this oration of myths is based is the one so often mentioned; it marks the close relationship between the future children and their noble ancestors of old, a source of strength to the former.

X's father now names those whom he wishes to assist him on the following day. These are the dancers, who are chosen primarily for their skill in dancing, and secondarily in accordance with their rank. With them he selects a number of persons to stand near and help or "cherish" them as they perform. He also asks the services of some of the women who are professional droners; of the keeper of the marriage song of his ancestral family; and, finally, of a number of men to sit near the singers and assist them with suggestions. It would be most exceptional for anyone so called upon to decline the honour. It is near morning by this time and the guests depart.

On the following morning, the actual wedding day, X's father calls to his house those selected the previous evening as dancers and their assistants. The former wear blankets decorated with small copper ornaments[1] and carry circular wooden rattles provided with handles. Their clothing and rattles may be their own, but if they do not possess suitable attire, it is incumbent on X's father to provide them. Skins are piled up within the house, and some of these are said to "make soft the

[1]At the present time there is uncertainty as to the proper clothing of a marriage dancer. Several informants stated that it was a copper-decorated blanket, whereas others said that there was no special attire; one man claimed that an attempt was made to imitate the form and costume of X's first ancestor, and another that round costume was used. Probably there was no uniformity in custom.

515 handles of the rattles"; symbolizing that they are pads to protect the hands, though the dancers derive no benefit from the pads, which are stacked with others for later distribution to Y's family. A large amount of provisions has been prepared and placed in boxes, one for each member of Y's family. In many cases it is difficult to estimate how much food will be required, and if there is a surplus, it is eaten by the performers and other assistants.

When all are ready they rush forth; dancers, dancers' assistants, and young relatives of X, followed more sedately by his father. The rest of the villagers watch with interest, but do not take part in the ceremony. Choosing a position outside Y's house, the singers beat the time of the marriage [593] song used by X's ancestors; if the words are known they sing [424] them. Like the prerogative of marriage dances, there may [424] not be a marriage song embodied in every origin myth, but if X lacks such he is usually able to borrow one.* The keeper of the song is stationed near the singers, ready to help them with the words or the tune, if necessary. Meanwhile the [595] dancers are performing on the sidewalk outside Y's house. Each uses whatever type of dance he chooses, kwiat, xeaxl, a'alt, or even shamat'a, but all dance simultaneously, though without paying greater attention to each other than is necessary to avoid collisions. The professional dancers ac- [533] company the singing with their high-pitched quavers.

Meanwhile Y's father, surrounded by his relatives and friends, waits in readiness within their house. Y herself is

*The reputed origin of marriage songs has been described in vol. I, chap. iv. They are less strongly preserved as prerogatives than most elements of origin myths; in fact some keepers of the songs are willing to perform or sell wedding, although this may be a modern development. The keeper, either man or woman, is chosen by the senior members of the ceremonial family, after discussion with the singers. It is his duty to remember each and tune, and the only pecuniary advantage is from the presents made by those to whom he teaches it. Some songs have words, others only a tune. The tune of a song brought down by Algaxtan is thought of as "Hahe, Sunshine! We do as we have done before. Please make good the path for those who are about to marry."

Algaxtan obtained this song from his heavenly ancestor and used it at the over marriage, as his male descendants have since done.

them, taking no inconspicuous a part as X does in the whole affair. As the singers start the marriage song, some of X's relatives carry into Y's house a part of the goods which X's relatives have assumed for the occasion, deposit them on the floor near the door, and then withdraw. These goods are said, "to sweep the house." Long ago they are said to have been of great value, though nowadays small presents are considered ample. Any member of Y's family can accept one by picking it from the floor, but as he is expected to return the gift with something of greater value, sometimes nothing is taken. Should none of his relatives appear willing to do so, it devolves on Y's father to accept the present.

When the marriage song has ended, X's father gives to some strong youth narrow strips of goat-skin with the wool still attached. Carrying these in one hand the young man runs up and down the sidewalk, waving his arms, and at intervals throwing one of the strips into the air, away from himself. All the younger people of the village pursue him, and a wild scramble takes place for each strip. Sometimes, instead of running up and down, the tossing is done in a clear space near Y's house. Only the sons of important chiefs are prohibited from this sport, since it is thought to be beneath their dignity. It is an animated scene, in which the participants thoroughly enjoy themselves. Should have the right to ask any dancer for his clothing, and unless he is willing to lose this, he must give a present to the one who has demanded it. This is a common source of amusement to the onlookers. Nothing is known of the origin or meaning of the wholesale giving away of strips of goat-skin, nor why the heralds should be able to demand clothing on this occasion.

"It has always been done," the Bella Coola say simply.

When the noise has somewhat subsided, the singers again beat out the time of the marriage song, and again the dancers begin to perform. Y's father then sends out one of his male relatives, with gifts, "to stop the dance." The bearer gives a present to one of the dancers, who ceases his gyrations, then 515 to the others in succession. If Y's father is not wealthy, he may dispense with presents to the dancers, who before long come of their own accord. When the song is finished, more strips of goat-skin are thrown in the manner already described. Then the song is sung for the third time, accompanied by the dancers who have not been "stopped" by the receipt of gifts. Again Y's father's friend brings out presents, to "stop" more of the dancers. After another disposal of goat-skin, and a fourth singing, all have been "stopped." Care is taken that at least one dancer is left to accompany the fourth singing of the song.

X's relatives now send in valuable presents to Y, her father, mother, and other relatives, and also to those who wish to associate themselves with Y's father in the marriage transaction, prompted by kindly feelings towards him, or, it may be, through a desire to display publicly their wealth and importance. The number of these individuals has been communicated secretly to X's kinsmen, who are thus able to send a present to each, such as a canoe, a slave, a marten, lynx, or goat-skin blanket, or some equally treasured object. These gifts are called "weapons of war," since the assumption is that X is acting like a warrior in taking something of value from Y's family. At the same time the goods that Y's father has given to stop the dancers are returned to him unostentatiously.

Y's father now invites X's party into his house by calling out:

"Come mine, come ninkiloq," "Enter you war-party, enter ye chiefs."

They go into the house and sit in a group in the place of honour behind the fire. Some of the other villagers may crowd in to watch, remaining near the front door, but having no part in the proceedings. Y's father superintends a distribution of food to his guests, sometimes a lavish feast, at other times a small meal, depending on the food supply and time of year.

In many cases, though not always, Y's father sings a ne-ele song at this juncture, emphasizing the importance of his dances by ancestry. He may wish to give X one of his ancestral names on this occasion, and if so, an eloquent speaker outlines the myth in which it is embedded, and announces that henceforth it belongs to X. He is called by it for the rest of the ceremony. Occasionally, X will receive several names, perhaps from different myths belonging to the different ancestral families of which Y is a member; or her father may grant X the especial use of some hunting-ground, although with the marriage he naturally has the right to use all belonging to his bride's ancestral family. Sound rarely, and Sacred prerogatives more commonly, may likewise be transmitted at this time, though they are never expounded, since some who are not members of these two societies may be present. X's father may likewise use his ce-tlo song and follow it by giving an ancient name to Y; if so, the procedure is the same as that just described.

Names transferred by marriage may be given when the engagement is announced, at the actual wedding or, as will be explained later, when the wife is rebought from her husband. A transference from the family of X to the family of Y is made only as a mark of respect and friendly feelings, but a transference in the opposite direction is necessary to establish the children on a firm footing. Accordingly, it is often delayed until after their birth, at a time when Y rebuys herself from her husband. A name borrowed at the wedding itself becomes the legal property of the recipient, but not of his ancestral family, since it cannot be passed on except to a child of X and Y. If there are no children, it is felt that the name has become practically dormant and it can be revived by a member of the donor's ancestral family. Thus it is virtually held in readiness for X's and Y's children, though literally this is not the case, since it belongs, meanwhile, to some individual. A sentiment that enters into a transaction of this kind is that, by the presentation of a name to some member of the family of the other partner, a kindly disposition is shown and confidence that it will be duly honoured by bestowal on the children of the couple. Indeed, some persons do no more than promise that

515 553 425 if a grandchild be born they will give him a certain name if a boy, and another if a girl, so that henceforth no one can take that title for himself, even though it is not in use. As already mentioned, even when a name has duly passed to one of the children, it can be recalled in future generations by a return marriage. The transmission of names, or the promising of them for children yet unborn, is perhaps the most binding feature of the whole marriage rite. Mythology contains instances in which names, and other prerogatives, have been given away outright. Cases are cited by the Bella Coola where a father has given hunting-grounds as "food" for the use of the relatives of his son- or daughter-in-law, but it is usual merely to promise the use of them to the grandchildren.

581 553 571 425 Since the transference of names, or other prerogatives, is the foundation stone of Bella Coola marriages, it is necessary to digress still further in an attempt to analyse the concepts at the base of the transaction. If the contracting parties are members of different ancestral families, or even of different branches of the same family, there is a feeling of strain and uneasiness at the intimate relations into which they are brought. There is a conflict of desires. On one hand is the wish to keep the family prerogatives from going afield; on the other, a wish that they should go afield to show the respect felt for the bride or bridegroom. If children result, the matter is simple, since they are equally members of the ancestral families of mother and father and form a bond which draws the two social units into the closest community of interest. Return marriages will then be sought by successive generations, until the prerogatives of the two families become so closely interwoven that a child will, indeed, be born into the ranks of related ancestors from both parents. But when there are no children the matter is complicated, since the recipients of names not uncommonly try to keep them unjustly. They may do so with the best intentions, feeling that it would be a slight to the donors to give them back. Bella Coola etiquette is not sufficiently exact to stipulate what should be done. If the

578 one of Smasan's relatives, and that the dispute about names was quite 425 sufficient to furnish an excuse for the deed.

It is hoped that these two instances will serve to emphasize why the [682] Bella Coola prefer marriages within the ranks of the ancestral family. When this takes place, names are usually given outright, and not merely promised for the use of the future children.

585 After this digression, to return to the marriage of X and Y: The ceremony is taking place in the house of Y's father, and the parents of each participant have expounded parts of their origin myths, and promised names for the resultant children.

Then Y's relatives give numerous presents to X's family, in each case including those who are associating themselves with the contract. Canoes, slaves, blankets, and other articles of great worth are given; they are said to be "bed covering" for Y. The greater their value, the greater her prestige. Her [537] father asks a fluent chief to address the assemblage, speaking as though he were Y. He says in effect:

"My father, my mother, my brothers, my uncles, and their associates have given me my bed covering."

These presents are the binding feature of the wedding. They are said to lock the girl in her husband's house, and [587] accordingly are sometimes called, "rope fastenings." This is only done when a woman is married for the first time.

[537] Another orator now holds forth on behalf of Y's father:

"What we do today is no small matter. We have done today what was done in former times, and what shall be done in the future."

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

One of Y's relatives now whispers to X's father that it is time to lead away the bride. One of X's party, either man or woman, comes forward, takes Y by the hand and guides her to a place among X's people, close to X himself. Y's father gives the conductor presents, which are not returnable. Without further ceremony, X's party returns to his house, taking the bride with them. She and X usually sit close together for the rest of the rite, but their actions are really of slight importance. 585

An hour or so after the return from Y's home, a messenger is sent to invite her father and other relatives to X's house. The guests seat themselves behind the fire, and a number of others crowd in to watch and listen. X and Y are both present, but do not take any leading part in the ceremony. A large amount of food is given to the guests, provided, of course, by X's father, and, as they are eating, a few gifts, termed "food," may be given. Then an eloquent chief expounds in lofty style the manner in which X's ancestors were married in the days of antiquity. As soon as his speech is ended, X's father distributes to Y's relatives presents, which are spoken of as "clothing." Theoretically, the presents "become nothing" for this purpose, but in reality they are returned later on as a means of increasing the prestige of each recipient. In consequence, care is taken to ensure that industrious individuals receive more than others. These presents are often of considerable value, since they not only mark the noble sentiments of X's family with regard to him, but they are also a sound financial investment on behalf of X, whose wife will help him at future potlatches. Goods received as "food" at the meal are restored in the same fashion as this "clothing." This completes the marriage ceremony. Y's relatives often stay for some time longer in X's house, but gradually go home as they think fit. [537]

That night X and Y sleep together.

It is contrary to custom for X's relatives to hoard the goods which they have received from Y's relatives as "bed

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

585 covering" or "rope fastening" for her. Within a few days or weeks, they must invite their fellow-villagers to a ceremony of some kind. If it is winter this can be a susook dance, but in summer it must be a non-sacred affair. Y's father and other relatives attend, furnished with the usual gifts. When the ceremony is over and the time has come for the distribution of presents, a herald calls out that X has no seat. If he has already been established in one he calls out that it is not firm.[7] Y at once brings forward some of the goods provided by her relatives, and places these with the goods which X's family received at the wedding and are about to give away. The whole is then divided among the guests, together with presents provided by X for Y's relatives. The actual purpose of the rite may be to obtain names for some of X's young relatives or to establish seats for them: it is immaterial to Y's people to what end they are applied. Within recent years this [182] has sometimes taken place at a kusiut dance, but such overlapping between the two types of ceremonial is probably an innovation due to decay.

177 About 1910 an effort was made to introduce a marriage 585 custom of the Kwakiutl. According to the Bella Coola, among them the wife gives to her husband's relatives one or more boards studded with teeth of the sea-otter. This makes teeth for the bride, so that if she ever quarrels with another woman she can draw back her lips and shame her rival by saying:

"What can you do? You have no teeth, while I have two sets," or as many boards as have been given at her marriage.

[563] The grandson of a Fort Rupert Kwakiutl, living in Bella Coola and considered a member of the tribe, owned one of these boards and used it at the marriage of his daughter in 1914. It was first given to the mother of the bridegroom, and repurchased with a copper; then given to the bridegroom, and redeemed; finally given, and again repurchased, from the father of the groom. The woman for whom this was done can

thus boast that she has three sets of teeth, but as the practice has not found favour in Bella Coola, it is little to her advantage.[8] 585 [177]

These complicated marriage rites are necessary to satisfy the pride of the two families in their origin myths, and the need to establish the resultant children in the paths of their ancestors. Among slaves or others who lack ancestral prerogatives, marriage is an affair of slight worth. Such persons simply live together with little ceremony, though they always try to give at least a feast so that there may be witnesses of the transaction. It is immaterial whether or not they marry their own relatives, since no ancestral prerogatives are to be transmitted. [556] [567] [581]

MARRIED LIFE

Y usually lives in the house of X's father, though economic circumstances may compel her husband to live in her home. If the parents are very wealthy, a house may be built for the young people, but usually their home is one of the bedrooms in the house of X's father; this patrilocal residence exposes Y not only to good advice from her mother-in-law, but often to caustic criticism. The married life of X and Y does not differ materially from that of other young couples in any part of the world, and is accordingly difficult to describe. Although love rarely enters into the original choice of a mate, a serviceable substitute is found in the mutual respect for each other's ancestry, and the knowledge of the importance of the rites performed with the aid of each other's elderly relatives. The young people realize that marriage affects the families of both, and accordingly accept it as a matter of course. The Bella Coola are fond of children. Their birth is a matter of sincere rejoicing, partly because it binds the two families more closely together, but parental affection is one of the strongest Bella Coola characteristics. The parents usually spoil their children; infants, especially, are never chastised and rarely 591 [556] 593 855 [861]

Marriage Songs

*533 As marriage songs, two distinct classes may be considered:
● 585 A. Those used at wedding;
[586] B. Shaming songs used in connection with divorce rites.
[578] The former are said to have been handed down from the distant past and consist of a few almost meaningless words. The latter are composed whenever required, and consist of foul allusions to the person being ridiculed.

Songs of this type are sung by the singers while the principal performer dances; in this respect, they resemble sisaok compositions and differ entirely from the abbreviated and individualistic wedding songs. Though used primarily to shame a runaway husband or wife, one is sometimes employed on other occasions.

trained midwives. The child is washed in warm water. For ten days the mother must remain in this hut. Father and mother must not go near the room for a year (according to Nuk'tla'ats, for ten days), else the salmon would take offence.

The child is soon given its first name. On this occasion the whole tribe is invited to a feast, the room is made public, and the guests receive small presents. The child retains this name until it becomes a member of the Ki'ulit, when it is given the Ki'ulit name. This ceremony takes place after puberty has been reached. About this period the young man gives his first potlatch and assumes the Qi'ulatca name.

When a girl reaches puberty she must stay in the shed which serves as her bedroom, where she has a separate fireplace. She is not allowed to descend to the main part of the house, and must not sit by the fire of the family. For four days she must remain motionless in a sitting posture. She fasts during the daytime, but is allowed a little food and drink at a very early hour in the morning. After this hour she may leave her room, but only through a separate opening. She must not yet come to the main room. When leaving the house she wears a large hat, which protects her face against the rays of the sun. It is believed that if the sun should shine on her face her eyes would suffer. She may pick berries on the hills, but must not come near the river or sea for a whole year. She must not eat fresh salmon, else she would lose her senses, or her mouth would be transformed into a long beak. She must not chew gum or eat snow (see Fifth Report of Committee, 1887, p. 110).

If a young man wishes to marry a girl he goes, accompanied by his friends, to the house of the girl's father and states his intention. His friends carry food and presents, and if the father accepts the suit he sends out a young man, who receives the food and presents and carries them into the house. Sometimes the father does not accept the offer at once. In such cases the young man may repeat the same ceremony until he is finally rejected or accepted. After the time of the marriage has been agreed upon between the contracting parties, and the day preceding the marriage has arrived, the young man invites all the people to a feast, during which he states that he is to be married on the following day. He asks a number of men, generally from twenty to thirty, and four women to assist him. On the following forenoon they assemble, and accompany the bridegroom to the girl's house. They sing outside, and four of the men dance. All of them have their faces painted red. Finally they enter, and the bridegroom gives a large amount of property to the girl's father. Then the girl leaves her parents and goes to the bridegroom, bringing him also a large amount of property which has been given to her for this purpose by her parents and relatives. He in turn gives her blankets and other apparel of the best quality, and distributes presents among her relatives. This is repeated after some time. All he has given to his bride and her relatives is repaid to him with interest. A rich girl will repay twice or three times the amount given by the man. At the time of the marriage the bride's father may promise the groom to give him his Sisa'ka secrets as soon as the pair have their first child. The children may belong to the father's or mother's gens, as the parents may choose.

In case of a separation the wife refunds the amount of purchase-money. The children may stay with either parent, or part of them may be made more powerful by magical means or the ritual acts of relatives. Although these often entail great labour and expense, parents seldom neglect their duty; in fact, care for their children is one of the strongest Bella Coola characteristics, though the methods used are so foreign to the white man that he has difficulty in realizing their meaning. The hope of both parents is to have children to carry on their names; infanticide is unknown and the death of an infant is mourned almost as much as that of an adult. Sterility and impotency are frequent causes for divorce.

At the present time there is a high birth-rate in Bella Coola, although the heavy infant mortality prevents any appreciable increase in the population. In the old days, it is said, there were always large families, though much confidence cannot be placed in this statement. In families where there are several children, the first-born, whether boy or girl, assumes an important position. His or her influence, as eldest, is naturally considerable, and the parents foster this through the vague feeling that it is proper for the eldest to be the most important in the family. In adult years and after marriage, the influence of the eldest of a family continues to have considerable weight with younger brothers and sisters.

If a man is poor he cannot hope to have more than one wife, and his family circle will be limited to their children, and perhaps to elderly parents. On the other hand, a wealthy and powerful man usually has a larger family. Not only may he have several wives, but his aged relatives, and those of his wife, look to him for support and assistance. Such are usually welcome to live in his house, very fond what aid they can in collecting food, and it greatly a man's pride and sense of power to be closely surrounded by a large family. The Bella Coola are, on the whole, considerate to their aged relatives.*

*This is not true of the present. During the winter of 1923-4 a feeble old man, living alone, was often in actual want of food. Disliked and degraded, of a most disagreeable himself, none of his surviving relatives, of whom the nearest were nephews, would take him into their homes. Commenting on this man's fate, several informants pointed out how, in the old days, such a man would have found 593 567 slave, and this is believed to have occurred on one occasion to the daughter of a chief.

432 448 Once, many hundred years ago, the daughter of a Bella Coola chief was married to the son of Tsaiowum, a Bella Bella chief, living at Spuyul. At the marriage, in Bella Coola, valuable presents were given by both families, and the girl went to live in Bella Bella with her husband. Some ten years later, Tsaiowum gave a large potlatch to which he had invited guests from all parts of the coast. As in duty bound, his daughter-in-law's relatives gave a certain amount of goods to rebuy her. They were not wealthy, so that the contribution was of small value. Tsaiowum had expected a larger present, and now found himself unable even to repay his debts to those who had assembled. He did not immediately show his resentment, but soon afterwards sold his daughter-in-law as slave to a Kitkatla chief. The Bella Coola were justly indignant, but could not make up their minds what to do in such an unprecedented case. The girl ultimately escaped and made her way home after lengthy wanderings (II, p. 505).

837 A husband demands faithfulness on the part of his wife, though he himself is often rather lax. Illicit intercourse is regarded, not as a deadly sin, but as an infringement of the husband's prerogatives. But if a woman should bear a child at a time when it was impossible for the husband to have been the father, due to absence, he would probably accept it as his [526] own and do no more than administer a beating, though some jealous men would divorce a wife for this. Bella Coola sentiment on such matters varies with the individual; it is universally considered to be a matter that concerns the husband [184] alone and he can do as he thinks fit. The daughters of chiefs are usually faithful to their husbands, whereas those of power persons, unrestrained by the valuables expended at their marriages, are more lax. If the husband should catch an adulterer, [187] he may, if he kill, slay him on the spot and the exaction of blood revenge would be uncalled for. Usually a fight ends the matter, though the offender's family may give presents to the aggrieved husband, and his wife's relatives may also make donations to atone for their daughter's failings. A husband does not share his wife with anyone, and a question as to the lending of a wife

583 feet."

When such an accident occurs, the relatives of X take some [558] future occasion to give presents to validate his child, with the announcement:

"The goods used from the repurchase of his mother have become nothing beneath his feet. We hereby supply that deficiency."

Thus it is demonstrated that the relatives of both parents are interested in his welfare, so that his path is clear before him.

553 Many women are only repurchased once, but an effort is 556 made to do this frequently since the more times, the greater
583 her prestige. After several repurchasings it is felt that the names and other prerogatives "dragged across" by Y have become valueless. But since new names have been taken to her husband on each occasion, the marks of friendship between the two families are still plain. Then it is that those first transmitted can be revived by relatives of Y, unless, of course, X has validated them for his children. If there is only one repurchasing, the names remain the definite property of X. This is not a clearly formulated law, merely a sentiment that the earlier names have been covered by those later given, and that accordingly Y's relatives, having done what was proper, can now use the titles once more. There is a constant interchange of names and privileges between families related by marriage.

556 It is virtually impossible to over-estimate the importance
583 of this rite of repurchase among the Bella Coola, one of the [182] few customs preserved tenaciously amid the ruins of their ancient culture. The writer was forcibly struck with the following instance which occurred while he was in Bella Coola:

About fifteen years before, a young man and woman had married with due formality. After three children had been [586] born, the mother took to drink and vice until her husband at last repudiated her, retaining possession of the children. The woman, weakened by disease, divorced by her husband, and

A man who is giving a ceremony of any kind can offer few greater insults to his wife's relatives than omission to ask their assistance. The following is a good instance of such an insult:

About 1900 a man and woman were married and had three children. Then the mother died, before being repurchased from her husband. In addition, the husband had assisted his wife's father when one of his younger children had died; so that it was most fitting that the wife's relatives should contribute to any ceremony given by the husband. Four years later the husband proposed to marry once more, and to have the wedding occur at a potlatch. But on the day of ultimatum, he insulted the relatives of his dead wife by failing to invite them. The cause of the feud was not disclosed, but the husband increased it by again failing to invite her family when, during the potlatch, they should have rebought her for the benefit of his young relatives about to be initiated into the ranks of the naxnox. The father of the dead woman came forward uninvited with a large present for each, saying in effect:

"I, too, have a right to contribute to said prestige to my daughter and her children."

In this way he defeated the wiles of his son-in-law who had hoped to shame his father-in-law by the failure of the latter to contribute to his potlatch. The son-in-law endeavoured to excuse himself by saying that his late wife's relatives had not assisted for so long that he thought they would not wish to do so. This retort further incensed the father of the dead woman so that next day he and his wife publicly gave the donee of the potlatch $300 "to make them where we sit."

This somewhat lengthy description has been necessary to explain the important part which the repurchase of wives plays in the lives of the Bella Coola; it is one of the fundamentals of society and is, therefore, worthy of attention.

DISSOLUTION OF MARRIAGE

968 [592]

Either death or divorce can terminate marriage. The decease of a wife is an unfortunate affair, quite apart from the grief which it may cause her husband. Two families have been brought into peculiarly close relations through her, and now the bond itself has snapped; delicate financial arrangements have been undertaken, and it is not easy to settle these without ill-feeling, particularly if the alliance was a return marriage. If no child has been born, and no repurchasing of the wife

587 carried out in toto, since the repurchasing has wiped out the original expenditure. This is not necessary in the case of elderly widows or widowers. It is considered fitting for a widow or widower to wait for at least six months before re-
[186] marrying. The Bella Coola say that in Bella Bella wives are willed, as if they were slaves.

586 In spite of the efforts made to ensure the stability of marriage by elaborate ceremonies and repeated exchange of presents by the two families, divorce is not unknown. Due to the decay of Bella Coola culture, it is now the rule and not the exception. It was difficult to obtain satisfactory data concerning its prevalence in the old days. Unquestionably every effort was made by both families to keep together a husband and wife who had been wed with due ceremony, but it is evident that these attempts were not always successful. If a husband deserts his wife, or she him, and refuses to return, it is considered that the marriage contract is at an end. The usual grounds for desertion on his part are childlessness, inability of the wife to help at potlatches, and habitual faithlessness. Continued cruelty and neglect are the usual reasons for a woman abandoning her husband. These factors seem to have governed divorce in years gone by, as well as at the present time. The most unfortunate consequence, in the eyes of the Bella Coola, is the stigma it casts on the children. The younger ones normally remain with the mother, those older use their own discretion, and sometimes pass back and forth from one parent to the other. Both mother and father continue to take an interest in their welfare, and a child can receive presents from either, irrespective of which he is living with. Hence the less, there is a sentimental bar against the children of a divorced couple who can be shamed by a reference to the marital faithlessness of a parent. This factor, combined with the difficulties, financial and otherwise, between the two families, explains the efforts made to prevent divorce and the odium with which it is regarded. Of course, if husband and wife are poor persons or slaves, married without elaborate ceremony, they can part at discretion without anyone being affected.

When a wife runs away and seeks refuge with another man, her husband sometimes tries to kill his rival, but frequently both families endeavour to heal the breach amicably. Some of her relatives, particularly those who played an influential part in the marriage, first ask the husband whether or not he is willing to take her back. If the answer is in the affirmative, they next try to persuade her to return. Every argument is used, in many cases combined with threats against her seducer, and the intermediaries often succeed. But she must never go back without presents, "to dry with fire the water that has entered the marriage." Her husband invites all his fellow-villagers to his house to a ceremony which is said "to uproot the house [of wealth]." The singers are in attendance and sing in succession many karim songs, followed by ramal songs, and to each the owner of the song dances, but since the supernatural beings are not present, the affair is of a non-sacred nature. The goods received from the family of the erring wife are distributed and the matter is at an end. Those who persuaded the wife to return are especially rewarded.

If the faithless wife should refuse to return, or if she should bear a child to her lover, reconciliation is not possible. Then it is incumbent on the women's relatives to return to the husband as much goods as he has expended, with additions if they wish to uphold their own reputation. If the husband is clearly to blame, or if he is the deserting partner, his wife's family are not required to return the gifts they have received. There is no judicial tribunal of any kind, the force of public opinion alone imparts restitution if the offender wishes to maintain his reputation in the community. Acting on this principle, the relatives of a deserted wife sometimes return to her husband's family the presents they have received, thereby demonstrating their nobility and at the same time shaming the offender.

Formerly there was an elaborate ceremony to shame the husband or wife who destroyed a marriage by deserting his, or her, partner for a lover. One informant, aged about seventy, twice took part in this rite when a young man, but probably did not know the full details of it. He stated that it followed a divorce of two persons who had been married with full ceremony, whereas another, slightly younger informant, who remembered having seen the ceremony once when a mere lad, believed that it was only in the families of commoners. It appears certain that the rite has not been practised since about 1880, consequently there is an element of doubt as to the actual details, and even as to whether it was an affair of chiefs or commoners. It is probable that it was among the former.

When a woman deserted her husband one of the leading chiefs would take this opportunity of giving a ceremony of the type known as Ikiyákaw.* After consulting with his fellows to ensure that no one had any objections, and rarely including the deserted husband, he summoned the singers to his house. He would tell them his plans, and they would prepare the songs for the occasion. Five or six were always composed, with an effort to include as many foul remarks and allusions as possible, particularly with regard to the organs of the woman and her lover.

The singers spent about a week composing the songs, and meanwhile the chief who was giving the ceremony prepared food and made other necessary arrangements. When these were ready, the donor invited to his house all the members of the xaxat and kaxiat societies for a rehearsal. The singers sang over the airs for the instruction of the guests. They were always worded as if it were the deserted husband speaking in foul terms of his ex-wife. The theme of one was:

"My wife has pudenda like those of a black bear."

The guests joined in the singing and also supplied foul themes by calling out observations about the organs of women in general, and of the deserting wife in particular. The singers

*The relation of this to the yáh dance of the same name is obscure, cf. I, p. 179.

tried to incorporate as many of these as possible, so that the rite soon became a chorus of obscenities. The songs were sung and resung until all present were familiar with them, then the donor of the rite distributed food and all departed. 516 626 837 996

The following afternoon everyone, including those uninitiated into either society, were invited to the donor's house. Probably the only absentees from the village were the deserting wife and her lover, while guests from neighbouring settlements were often in attendance. On this occasion, for the first time, the deserted husband used to take the leading part. When the singers struck up the tune of the first song, he used to appear, supported by four or five assistants. His face was blackened with soot, he wore a lynx-skin belt, and above his head was fashioned some insulting object, usually a representation of the female organs made of wood, cedar-bark and berries, as realistic as possible. As the singers sang, aided by those who had learnt the songs on the previous day, the husband danced, moving his body so that the ornament on top of his head was shaken suggestively. Meanwhile the spectators kept calling out filthy epithets of any kind on his ex-wife and her lover. Sometimes the dancer was able to insert some obscene remarks into the display. On one occasion, for example, he pulled some lynx fur from his belt and threw it in the face of a Tsi'is man who happened to be present, and who had once seduced a married woman and accordingly been the butt of a similar rite, with the remark: [302] [292]

"All Tsi'is women have hairy pudends like that."

The guests were invited to suggest foul nick-names for the man with whom the dancer's wife had eloped. One of these was adopted by general agreement of opinion, and the man was commonly called by it henceforth. Two names so created were: [551]

Stalcc, "The One Whose Face is Wrinkled like a Woman's Organs," and, Emulcutt, "The One Who Cohabited Publicly."

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NEB Bellacoola NEB

One very old man is still, 1923, commonly called by this last designation, much to his annoyance.

When the songs had been sung, each accompanied by the dancing of the deserted husband, the donor of the ceremony distributed food and the guests departed. The only advantage to the giver of the rite was that it enabled him to show his wealth in an apparently disinterested fashion by gifts of food. Usually he was a friend of the aggrieved husband.

When a husband deserted his wife, the other women of the village used to perform an exactly similar ceremony. The same type of songs were composed, and during their singing the deserted wife used to dance, wearing above her head representations of a penis and testicles. By means of hidden strings she was able to cause the former to become erect.

On other occasions the ceremony was varied by an announcer asking the offended party about the appearance of the deserter. There followed a minute and highly coloured description about the unpleasantness of his genital organs, a description which was swiftly incorporated into the songs.

It can be taken as a matter of course that the above description is little more than an outline of the Bella Coola ceremony of shaming. In spite of its deficiencies, it is important, as evidence of the former sentiment with regard to divorce. Obscene though the ceremony must have been, both in acting and in the free use of personalities, it must have been a powerful deterrent to divorce.* Indeed it would be difficult to imagine a stronger one in a community where a man's position is judged by public opinion and where his greatest aversion is to public ridicule. It is unfortunate that we shall probably never know whether the rite was associated with chiefs or commoners.

CEREMONIAL MARRIAGE

Since marriage gains much of its importance from the complicated business transactions between the two families, with [534] faithful and cases of rape were either unknown or very rare.

[534] The daughters of chiefs, too, were guarded with great care and 422 any effort to seduce one of them would be punished by her 534 father. The parents of a girl used to watch her carefully, and the opportunity for immorality was not great in the days when everyone went to bed at sundown except on the occasion of a ceremonial dance. As one informant described it:

"The daughters of chiefs used to be looked after as if they were in boxes, cherished and guarded by their parents and relatives. No one would dream of molesting them. And a chief's daughter used to be proud and look after herself. Nowadays, girls don't care, and everything has become degraded."

[536] If the daughter of a chief did demean herself, the parents lost interest in her, as one who was spoilt. It was always assumed that a girl of rank was a virgin at marriage, and if it was discovered that she had been living an immoral life, her husband in many cases returned her in disgrace to her parents who, equally shamed, were expected to send back to him the goods he had expended for their daughter. Loss of virtue was 422 judged only from indirect information. If the daughter of a 548 chief was found pregnant before marriage, she was almost ostracized by her family. No ceremonial marriage could be arranged for her, and the child could not be cleansed from the stigma of illegitimacy.

536 On the other hand, it appears certain that there was a good 527 deal of intercourse in the old days between chiefs and slave women, or even between slaves and the daughters of chiefs.
[431] In the latter case the woman was often cast aside by her relatives though they sometimes yielded to the inevitable and tried to wash away the disgrace with gifts. At the same time, public opinion was unfavourable to a man who consorted with many women, or to a woman who allowed herself to be at the disposal of many men. Any regular union of masters with their slave women for the deliberate purpose of having children was unknown. A girl's consent was always necessary, given either personally or through an intermediary. Even a chief hesitated

(d) The meaning of the whole song is extremely obscure.

Marriage Songs

*583 As marriage songs, two distinct classes may be considered:
585 A. Those used at weddings;
[584] B. Shaming songs used in connection with divorce rites.
[578] The former are said to have been handed down from the distant past and consist of a few almost meaningless words. The latter are composed whenever required, and consist of foul allusions to the person being ridiculed.

WEDDING SONGS

Sisa Marriage Song(a)

(a) Recorded as song VII D 3h, National Museum of Canada; singer, Lame Charlie.
[778] (b) Qwlcyu came down with xyayaxal in the beginning of time, and brought, [424] as a gift from Alqmxtm, the prerogative of dancing at weddings. He landed at [778] Kimsquit, and no explanation is given by the Bella Coola for the use of this song by the people of Sisa.
(c) A reference to a marriage among the first people on earth. One of Qwlcyu's associates married a woman whose relatives had brought light with them from above.

(b) Xemtsk came down from above with ayayayat in the beginning of time; he had the prerogative of dancing at weddings. 533*

(c) Qulaiya likewise came down with ayayayat, bringing the same prerogative as Xemtsk. 585

(d) The rest of this song has been forgotten. [779] [424]

Fragmentary and short as are these songs, they are more elaborate than many used at weddings. These frequently contain no words, merely an ancient tune accompanied by humming and meaningless choral interjections.[4]

SHAMING SONGS

Songs of this type are sung by the singers while the principal performer dances; in this respect, they resemble sisaok compositions and differ entirely from the abbreviated and individualistic wedding songs. Though used primarily to shame a runaway husband or wife, one is sometimes employed on other occasions. 586 578 [585]

Song Used for Ne-ḡwa(a), a Kimsquit Woman(b)

you have had much trouble,	your breasts have become long and petulant.

[WOMBLESS CHORUS]

C The third part of this song has been forgotten.

(a) This word means "The one (feminine) with the very hairy pudendum." The woman in question had run away from her husband and the nickname was conferred at this shaming Ma'yalum rite. [551] [553]

Two examples of such wordless songs were collected. They are song VII D 3a, National Museum of Canada; singer, Jim Pollard, and song VII D 3c, National Museum of Canada; singer, Lame Charlie.

(c) This occurred name is one of the designations of Mount Nuphelis.
(d) This expression merely adds force to the complaint of the aggrieved husband. It was impossible to obtain an accurate translation of each subdivision.
(f) Referring to old women in general.
(g) In this second part, the theme changes from the specific phrase of the aggrieved husband to his condemnation and criticism of the whole female sex. Such contradictions are common in dancing songs, and are often accompanied by a change of tune.

C The third part of this song has been forgotten.

(a) This song was sung by women to shame Nuhelis who had deserted his wife. It was the work of a feminine composer, Tsawa.
(b) Recorded on song VII D 10b, National Museum of Canada, singer, Joe Pollard.
(c) It was impossible to obtain translations of each subdivision.
(d) Any weakness is picked upon in a dancing song. Nuhelis must have failed to perform some of any kind, and the feminine members chose to decide him for this lapsed of his faithlessness.
(e) It was impossible to obtain translations of each subdivision.
(f) Ellis was one of the regular Kwagiutl singers who had shown special aptitude in the insertion of obscene expressions to songs used by men to decide faithless women. The women apparently considered this a good opportunity to voice their general disapproval by coupling his name with that of Nuhelis. Ellis had suffered a broken arm when fighting and it had been badly set.

Song Used for Ewa(a), a Kwagiutl Woman(b)

9 The third part, if it was omitted, has been forgotten.

(a) This differs from most forgotten songs in that it was an commercial medium, not a fetishism rite. This was held up to scorn by the men of Kwagiutl and this song transported the law by a certain Hamatsa.
(b) Recorded on song 418 (I Ha, National Museum of Canada, Ottawa, Ont. Indian) [944]
(c) It is said that women, even of slave blood, used to embarrass or increase their importance in the eyes of their children by boasting, falsely, of ancestral honors. [554]
(d) A form of superstitious, difficult to translate. It is said to imply slave ancestry, but is more probably a mere epithet, referring to the female organs. [195]
(e) This is addressed to women in general. [195]
(f) An expression of pride or scorn, used under all circumstances. [195]
(g) The theme is here changed as if it were that herself speaking. This is a common device in all kinds of songs.
(h) Robert was supposed to be the father of Ann's child.

Mourning Songs

Mourning songs excel all other Bella Coola compositions in length, complexity, and wealth of detail. Especially those composed for mighty chiefs contain numerous references to the ancestral history of the deceased and mention incidents referred to in origin myths, a source of pride to the survivors and of envy to those who listen. 533* [765] [766]

[illegible] midwives. The child is washed in warm water. For ten days the mother must remain in this hut. Father and mother must not go near the room for a year (according to Boas' Vision, for ten days), else the unborn would take offence.

The child is now given its first name. On this occasion the whole tribe is invited to a feast, the room is made public, and the guests receive small presents. The child owing this name until it becomes a member of the Kwakiutl, when it is given its Kwakiutl name. This ceremony takes place when puberty has been reached. About this period the young man gives his first potlatch and assumes the Qi'wistin name.

When a girl reaches puberty she must stay in the shed which serves as her bedroom, where she has a separate fireplace. She is not allowed to descend to the main part of the house, and must not sit by the fire of the family. For four days she must remain motionless in a sitting posture. She fasts during the daytime, but is allowed a little food and drink at a very early hour in the morning. After this time she may leave her room, but only through a separate opening. She must not pass near to the main room. When leaving the house she wears a large hat, which protects her face against the rays of the sun. It is believed that if the sun should shine on her face her eyes would suffer. She may pick berries on the hills, but must not cross over the river or sea for a whole year. She must not eat fresh salmon, else she would lose her senses, or her mouth would be transformed into a long beak. She must not show grief or eat more (see Fifth Report of Committee, [illegible], p. [illegible]).

If a young man wishes to marry a girl he goes, accompanied by his friends, to the house of the girl's father and states his intention. His friends carry food and presents, and if the father accepts the suit he sends out a young man, who receives the food and presents and carries them into the house. Sometimes the father does not accept the offer at once. In such cases the young man may repeat the same ceremony until he is finally rejected or accepted. After the date of the marriage has been agreed upon between the contracting parties, and the day preceding the marriage has arrived, the young man invites all the people to a feast, during which he states that he is to be married on the following day. He also a number of men, generally from twenty to thirty, and four women to assist him. On the following forenoon they assemble, and accompany the bridegroom to the girl's house. They sing outside, and four of the men dance. All of them have their faces painted red. Finally they enter, and the bridegroom gives a large amount of property to the girl's father. Then the girl leaves her parents and goes to the bridegroom, bringing him also a large amount of property which has been given to her for this purpose by her parents and relatives. He in turn gives her blankets and other articles of the best quality, and distributes presents among her relatives. This is repeated after some time. All he has given to his bride and her relatives is repaid to him with interest. A rich girl will repay twice or three times the amount given by the man. At the time of the marriage the bride's father may promise the groom to give him his daughter's sister as soon as she gets from their first child. The children may belong to the father's or mother's gens, as the parents may choose.

In case of a separation the wife refunds the amount of purchase money. The children may stay with either parents, or part of them may go with the mother and part with the father. The decision is left to the parents and children.

When a person has died, the corpse is washed, the face painted red, the legs are doubled up, and the arms folded over the breast. The commencement of the deceased to put into his mouth, his attire to put on, the back part covering the breast and the front part turned back-ward. The body is placed in a box and the latter is either fastened on the lower branches of a tree or placed in a little house, which is set on posts, above the level of the ground. The face of the deceased is turned eastward. Part of his property and gifts from his friends are deposited near the grave. The tombs of the deceased are buried. Sky cloth is spread on a memorial column, which also shows how many canoes, copper, beads, blankets and shawls he had given away at potlatches. These objects are painted or carved on the column. Carefully shown even killed at the burial of chiefs. The number of slaves killed was also indicated by as many human figures on the memorial column. After burial food for the use of the deceased is thrown into the fire. This is repeated frequently during a prolonged period after the death has occurred. Whenever the friends of the deceased partake of a meal a little food is thrown down as a place between the fire and the door, where the entrance to the house would, the house of the dead, is believed to be.

The bed of a mourner must be protected against the ghost of the deceased. He must relieve stick a down-bent into the ground at each corner of their beds. After two days these are thrown into the water. Mourners must rise early and go into the woods, where they stick down-bended into the ground, at the corners of a square, in which they choose themselves by setting their bodies with cedar-branches. They also cover to people. After mourning they shave hair small down and away through the clothes, following the course of the sun. This they do on two subsequent mornings, shaving one from every day. Mourners not their hair short. The hair that has been cut off is burnt. If they should not observe these regulations it is believed that they would friends of the deceased. Women when mourning wrapped their clothes with skins or stones.

The mourning regulations for a widower or a widow are especially strict. For four days he (or she) must fast, and must not speak a word, also the dead with an husband would lay a hand on the mouth of the widower, who nearly dies. They must not go near water, and are forbidden to comb or cut colours for a whole year. For the same length of time they must not eat fresh herring or chickens. Widow and widower choose themselves in the same way as other mourners. Their children are considered orphans, and must not fall on any person.

Some time after the death of a rich or influential person he usually relatives broken the whole tribe to a potlatch. On this occasion he stages a mourning song for the deceased and gives away presents to his guests. It was explained to me that this ended the mourning, and that it was the custom to giving away the house of the deceased.

Religion and Superstition.

The mythology of the Bilqula differs greatly from the mythologies of the other tribes of the North Pacific coast. It is impossible to say to [illegible] one of the bride's relatives were murdered at Kimsquit. The dispute was never demanded, but most of the Bella Coola believe that it was done by one of Dawson's relatives, and that the dispute about names was quite sufficient to furnish an excuse for the deed.

[illegible] It is hoped that these two instances will serve to emphasize why the Bella Coola prefer marriages within the ranks of the ancestral family. When the other place, names are usually given outright, and are merely presented for the use of the future children.

[illegible] After this digression, to return to the marriage of X and Y. The ceremony is taking place in the house of Y's father, and the parents of each participant have impounded parts of their origin myths, and presented names for the resultant children.

Then Y's relatives give numerous presents to X's family, in each case including those who are associating themselves with the contract. Canoes, slaves, blankets, and other articles of great worth are given; they are said to be "bad covering" for X. The greater their value, the greater her prestige. The father calls a Raven chief to address the newlyweds, speaking as though he were Y. He says to effect:

"My father, my mother, my brothers, my sisters, and their ancestors have given me my bad covering."

These presents are the binding factors of the wedding. They are said to lock the girl in her husband's house, and accordingly are sometimes called, "rope marriage." This is only done when a woman is married for the first time.

Another speech now holds forth on behalf of Y's father:

"When we do today is no small matter. We have done today what was done in former times, and what shall be done in the future."

married men, her relatives are expected to return to her husband's family the goods received during the engagement and at the wedding. The matter is then settled. If the deceased has a younger sister, cousin, or other near relative, an effort is usually made to have this individual replace the dead wife.* No further goods are given, except perhaps a few to add dignity to the ceremonies, the new wife merely replaces her dead sister and the bond between the two families continues unbroken. If the husband should die, his wife's relatives are considered honorable and endowed with the minds of chiefs if they restore to his relatives the presents which they have received. But if the wife can be remarried to one of his relatives, there is no need for this and the two families continue to enjoy the mutual strength acquired by the long period of engagement and exchange of benefits and presents.

If death takes place after the repurchasing of the wife, there is no need to return presents, since the offspring has cancelled the expenditure by the husband. If children have been born and the women has long become practically a member of her husband's family, she is buried by them as a matter of course, but should she die soon after marriage, her own family usually performs the obsequies.

With the passing of many years of married life, the repurchasing several times of the women, and the birth of children, she becomes so much a member of her husband's family that his death seldom ends the arrangement. The widow either no longer a slave and usually is master of her own destiny, especially if she has children and has reached a position of eminence in the community. Since the desirability of preserving the bond between the two families is fully realized, it is accordingly customary for a widow to wed her husband's brother, or a husband his deceased wife's sister. But in such case the ritual of marriage and exchange of presents must be

537 carried out in toto, since the repurchasing has wiped out the original expenditure. This is not necessary in the case of elderly widows or widowers. It is considered fitting for a widow or widower to wait for at least six months before re-
[NL] marrying. The Bella Coola say that in Bella Bella wives are willed, as if they were slaves.

536 In spite of the efforts made to ensure the stability of marriage by elaborate ceremonies and repeated exchange of presents by the two families, divorce is not unknown. Due to the decay of Bella Coola culture, it is now the rule and not the exception. It was difficult to obtain satisfactory data concerning its prevalence in the old days. Unquestionably every effort was made by both families to keep together a husband and wife who had been wed with due ceremony, but it is evident that these attempts were not always successful. If a husband deserts his wife, or she him, and refuses to return, it is considered that the marriage contract is at an end. The usual grounds for desertion on his part are childlessness, inability of the wife to help at potlatches, and habitual faithlessness. Continued cruelty and neglect are the usual reasons for a woman abandoning her husband. These factors seem to have governed divorce in years gone by, as well as at the present time. The most unfortunate consequence, in the eyes of the Bella Coola, is the stigma it casts on the children. The younger ones normally remain with the mother, those older use their own discretion, and sometimes pass back and forth from one parent to the other. Both mother and father continue to take an interest in their welfare, and a child can receive prerogatives from either, irrespective of which he is living with. Hence the law, there is a sentimental bar against the children of a divorced couple who can be shamed by a reference to the marital faithlessness of a parent. This factor, combined with the difficulties, financial and otherwise, between the two families, explains the efforts made to prevent divorce and the odium with which it is regarded. Of course, if husband and wife are poor persons or slaves, married without elaborate place in the manner already described. After passing through the fourth hole, or for the fourth time through the single opening, the two go to some lonely pool in the forest where the mourner washes. They light a fire and deposit on it some of his clothing, placing the rest in a stump or hollow tree. The friend always takes with him a supply of new clothing which the person being purified puts on and returns home, cleansed from the immediate taint of death. 764 783

The above rite protects widower or widow, but does not alter the fact that for one year they are ceremonially "unclean" and must obey sundry taboos. They must not go to the bank of the river, or even appear at the front door of a house facing it. To do so is displeasing to the salmon; for the same reason they cannot eat this fish unless it has been smoked. If they wish to travel on the ocean, they cannot embark at the village but must go through the woods to a point on the shore and there be picked up by the canoe. There is a regular "Widows and Widowers Rock" about a mile on either side of every village on the ocean. The one near Kitnaqui is called Sgiwi'ti, and there is thought to be blood on it. A person mourning a consort must wear a hat decorated with miniature coppers of which the bottoms are bent upwards; should this be omitted, when the offender remarries, the new husband or wife will soon die. 765 [785] [785] [262] [484] [292] [761]

In addition to these taboos, there are customary laws of behaviour, an infraction of which renders the offender liable to social disapproval. Widows and widowers should cut their hair short, and the former should rub ashes on the face. Sexual intercourse is prohibited to both sexes; if this rule is broken, the relatives of the deceased are insulted. Remarriage should not take place for at least a year, although among poor people it sometimes occurs after only six months, in which case all taboos and restrictions automatically cease. There is no law on this point, but it is considered fitting to allow this period to elapse. These requirements clearly indicate that bereavement is not merely an individual affair, but entails social and [621] [302] [784] [587] [735]

the hand, and they found the various assets. Finally they stripped off the false skin and disclosed the body of the bad woman. The whole population of the village had gathered by this time and all were witnesses to the impostures. Itsaa spoke:

"I had my suspicions that this was the case; this woman came to the camp and asked my wife a great many questions. I told her that she had done wrong in letting a stranger know the details of my observance of ceremonial chastity."

"Have you any idea where your wife is?" asked the chief.

"No," replied Itsaa. "The only clue I have is that an owl kept calling from that tree over yonder behind the house, saying: 'Itsaa's wife has tied up a fold of skin around her lips.'"[1]

The young men began to dig under the tree and presently uncovered the skinned body which had been thrown into the earth without clothing of any kind. The people, filled with grief and horror at the deed, showed their sympathy by gifts to Itsaa; a coffin with carved sides, copper knives, and other valuables to place beside the body in it. The corpse was washed and burnt in state with the many presents, including a large number given by Itsaa himself, to the cemetery near the village, where it was interred. The family of the murderess buried her hastily on the spot, fearing the wrath of the people at the crime she had committed.

Itsaa was so heartbroken that he did not leave off mourn, but supported himself on the stump laid up in his house. Grieved though he was at his wife's loss, a greater sorrow was that she had not lived long enough to bear him a son to perpetuate his name. Some four months after her death his father-in-law approached him, suggesting that he marry one of her sisters. The dead woman had two brothers and three sisters, and the whole family sympathized with the bereaved husband. Itsaa was very much pleased with the proposition and promptly married one of the sisters,[2] who took the place of the murdered woman. Once more Itsaa went hunting, in which he was so successful that many youths were constantly employed carrying home his game.

Within a year his wife bore him a male child who was likewise given the name of Itsaa and who received supernatural good fortune at a time of famine.

with the others, including the one who had just been leader, as followers. It is said that there was rarely friction among the joint husbands, since each realized that his turn would come as head of the household, and meanwhile the wife endeavoured to share her favours indiscriminately. The children were considered equally the offspring of each husband, thus automatically acquiring membership in several ancestral families. Such were regarded as indeed fortunate, provided with every potential means of assistance in the struggle of life. 595 556 [851]

Recognizing its importance, every effort was made to verify this information. Further questioning elicited the statement that the informant had never seen a case of this, though he asserted that when a young man he had often heard of it and that the custom had then only recently died out. Another old man and an elderly woman confirmed the above statement almost word for word, and each added that it was well known when they were young, though they had never actually seen it in practice. One man believed that the custom had formerly prevailed in several parts of the coast, and said that he had heard of its occurrence among the "Kwatcine" people near Newitte. Considering the reliability of his informants, the writer gives as his personal belief that the institution of polyandry among the daughters of chiefs occurred in Bella Coola not many years ago. Knowledge of the term of address for co-husband, already given, is strong evidence in support of this view. 128 595 556

Since it has been assumed that Y is the daughter of a chief, properly married with due formality, it is necessary to digress still further from the account of her relations with X to describe connections of a less creditable nature. The most common of these was with slaves. Though frowned upon by all Bella Coola ethics, such alliances, of a permanent nature, do not appear to have been rare. In some cases it was a man who thus demeaned himself, in some a woman. Since no slave could provide the goods necessary for an elaborate wedding, the 567 588

567 ceremony usually consisted simply of the man and woman
588 living together. In theory, this prevented the children from ever obtaining a name or other prerogative embodied in the ancestral myth of the free-born parent, and an effort was always made to conceal from them the details of the ancestral family's origin myth. But, as already described in the section dealing with slaves, the expenditure of valuable presents served to eradicate, or at least to cover, the blot. If the child succeeded in giving many potlatches, the stain was generally
[556] forgotten. On the other hand, if the child of a slave married to a free man was not "washed," he could always be shamed by a reminder of the disgrace of his parents' wedding.

682 In case of murder, the son or other near relative of the victim sometimes accepts a daughter or other member of the [583] offender's family instead of exacting blood revenge. The bride is delivered to her husband with valuable goods "to wash away [627] the blood," but these never suffice entirely to remove the disgrace from her or her children. The latter may inherit names and prerogatives from their father, but even if they attain to the position of chiefs, they can always be put to shame by reference to their mother's marriage as an atonement for murder. Of course the influence of a great chief makes it impolitic to refer to his ancestry, and there are a few instances of men having reached such a position of eminence that the blot [554] has been practically forgotten. The wife's family must continue to give presents to the husband for years after marriage, otherwise her lot is unenviable indeed, and her children have the status of the unwashed offspring of a slave and a free-man. In some cases a marriage of this type is entered upon years after a murder, if a son or other descendant wishes to end the anxiety of constantly expecting blood revenge.

REPURCHASE OF THE WIFE

556 Repurchase of a wife is the necessary consequence of every 583 reputable Bella Coola marriage. It is assumed that the pre-

586 One very old man is still, 1923, commonly called by this 626 last designation, much to his annoyance.

When the songs had been sung, each accompanied by the 837 dancing of the deserted husband, the donor of the ceremony
946 distributed food and the guests departed. The only advantage [556] to the giver of the rite was that it enabled him to show his wealth in an apparently disinterested fashion by gifts of food. Usually he was a friend of the aggrieved husband.

When a husband deserted his wife, the other women of the village used to perform an exactly similar ceremony. The same type of songs were composed, and during their singing [292] the deserted wife used to dance, wearing above her head representations of a penis and testicles. By means of hidden strings she was able to cause the former to become erect.

On other occasions the ceremony was varied by an announcer asking the offended party about the appearance of the deserter. There followed a minute and highly coloured description about the unpleasantness of his genital organs, a description which was swiftly incorporated into the songs.

It can be taken as a matter of course that the above description is little more than an outline of the Bella Coola ceremony of shaming. In spite of its deficiencies, it is important, as evidence of the former sentiment with regard to divorce. Obscene though the ceremony must have been, both in acting and in the free use of personalities, it must have been a powerful deterrent to divorce.* Indeed it would be difficult to imagine a stronger one in a community where a man's position is judged by public opinion and where his greatest aversion is to public ridicule. It is unfortunate that we shall probably never know whether the rite was associated with chiefs or commoners.

CEREMONIAL MARRIAGE

588 Since marriage gains much of its importance from the com-552 plicated business transactions between the two families, with [848] *A similar rite was occasionally carried out for unmarried mothers.

[illegible]
[illegible]

the sexual side neglected, it is perhaps not surprising that the Bella Coola carry out a ceremonial form entirely dissociated from marital rights. It is believed that such ceremonial marriages were performed by the first inhabitants of this earth, and that they have been customary ever since. A careful father or uncle always endeavors to arrange such a rite for a girl when she is two or three years of age. The relatives decide on some influential chief whom they would like to have as their daughter's fictitious husband, considering his wealth and prestige, but not his age. They interview the proposed bridegroom, who may consult his wife or other relatives before accepting, although he rarely refuses, as that would be an insult to the petitioners as well as a financial loss to himself. No period of engagement is necessary, as the wedding is arranged for the near future. Among important chiefs the ritual is identical with that of real marriage, though usually it is somewhat curtailed. The relatives of the bride welcome her husband and his relatives in their house and receive from him rather larger presents than they give; the same remark is made about it being the proper time to take the bride to her new home, and the husband and his party depart, without the girl. Presents of names or prerogatives may likewise be transmitted. The two are now considered as married, although there is no necessity for husband and wife even to see one another; on the other hand, there is no reason for avoidance since the marriage is essentially a business affair and not a sexual one. Whenever the husband gives a potlatch or other ceremony, he is assisted by the relatives of his fictitious wife, sometimes to a greater extent than by the relatives of his real one. This ceremonial wedlock may last for three or four years, until the relatives of the wife relegy her from her husband. On this occasion it is essential that he receive from the relations of his fictitious wife presents of greater value than he himself has given, otherwise she would be disgraced. Ceremonial marriage differs from real marriage in that one repurchasing terminates [551] [552] is, although it is customary for the parents of a wife to exhibit their wealth on several occasions.

What are the advantages of such an agreement to the two parties? The husband receives considerable assistance, both in actual goods and in ceremonial prerogatives. Moreover, his vanity is gratified by the desire shown by others to have him as husband of their daughters. The advantages to the wife are more difficult to describe. Financially, her relatives always lose, yet they consider that the prestige gained by their daughter as wife of a mighty chief fully compensates for their monetary loss. Accordingly, they take pains to have a daughter married several times before puberty, either simultaneously or in succession. Thus there is a form of ceremonial polyandry [553] pointing to Bella Coola at the present day. No ceremonial marriage takes place after puberty. In later years, when the [554] girl grows up, matrons, and has children of her own, their status is increased materially by the pre-puberty marriages of their mother. They address her fictitious husband as "father," and his children as brother or sister, although there are no incest prohibitions with regard to them. A chief sometimes arranges the bestowal of names or other prerogatives on the children of a fictitious co-wife, but such favours are too uncertain to provide a motive for the prevalence of the rite. Its value rests on the esteem attached to a woman whose relatives have shown their wealth and prowess by marrying her several times. When her children quarrel with their playfellows, it is common to hear one boast:

"I have three fathers. How many have you?"

[558] Occasionally the relatives of a fictitious bride are unable to provide the goods to repurchase her from her husband and the girl remains disgraced for life. In no circumstances has her husband any claims to marital rights with her, and in due course she can marry someone else; but it is never forgotten that she was not rebought from her husband. In 1916 a girl about four years of age was married to a man of sixty, who at the time gave her relatives $80 and a motor boat. She had not yet been repurchased in 1924 and the Bella Coola were beginning to look askance at her. It is doubtful whether the child realized that she was married, certainly the fact had not the slightest effect on her behaviour. Unless the wife is rebought, any names which she took to her husband at her fictitious marriage remain his property.

Ceremonial marriages are sometimes carried out for special reasons. If the husband at a real marriage feels that he is over-indebted to his wife's relatives through the names and prerogatives they have brought him, he sometimes arranges to restore some of them and thus even the transaction by ceremonially marrying one of his young female relatives to one of his wife's family. She takes back some of the acquired names to her fictitious husband and the matter is amicably arranged. Realizing the difficulties experienced by the father of many daughters, one of his sons-in-law may, if his father-in-law has many times rebought his daughter and so demonstrated his stability, try to arrange a fictitious marriage between the old man and one of his son-in-law's relatives. It often happens that the proud old chief will decline such assistance, confident in his own ability and prestige. Revenge is often settled by a fictitious marriage, arranged in the same manner and with the same armchair origins as that already described. Sometimes the infant is ceremonially married to the son of a chief, instead of to the chief himself, though no true wedlock follows. [227]

It is not even necessary to have a small girl to act as bride. If a man wishes to ally himself by marriage to a famous chief and lacks a daughter, he can perform the marriage rite with a "bride" consisting of his finger, leg, hand, or other part of the body. In a case in 1915 the "wife" was a favourite dog, which was duly married to a chief. In fact, ceremonial marriage is merely one of the many methods used by the Bella Coola to enter into financial dealings with an influential chief; it provides an honourable means of displaying the wealth of the bride's family; it increases the prestige of a girl and her relatives, or the prestige of her relatives alone if "she" is an inani-

588 556 many objects. Bella Coola financiers are always seeking to arrange such undertakings; the potlatch is the culminating point, but the same principle pervades their whole life.

It is to the advantage of the intending donor of a potlatch to become the fictitious husband of as many children as possible. Accordingly he sometimes takes the initial step, so is customary for the relatives of the husband in real marriage, but not in ceremonial. In such a case it is necessary for him to offer some inducement, perhaps in the form of one of the few women's names brought to earth in the beginning of time. He approaches a suitable father-in-law, suggesting that at a fictitious marriage he would be willing to give his wife a noble woman's name. If this is agreeable, the rite is carried out accordingly. The wife is in many cases a son of the person to whom the proposal was made; he duly receives a woman's name, the only circumstance under which this is possible. The actual designation will probably be returned through many repurchasings, but the boy has reached an enviable position. In later years he can always silence a person with whom he is quarrelling by saying:

"I need not answer you. You cannot even approach my body, so thickly am I padded with the goods which my father used when he rebought me."

556 608 858 Another business transaction of a similar nature is the giving of a small infant to an old person to "hold." This appears to be uncommon, and the only instance about which information was available occurred under the following circumstances:

A man and a woman were married with full ceremony and the best of feelings prevailed between the two families. The wife was several times rebought until she and her relatives had fully maintained their dignity, in fact the relations of the husband felt that they were being out-shone. Then the wife's father died. To mark their sympathy, the husband's family gave the widow one of her daughter's children to "hold." Valuable non-returnable presents were transmitted as "soft the most famous of all talismans, and, therefore, a potent protection against supernatural beings. It is valuable as a defense against evil monsters, but it is equally deadly to shamans and other human beings with supernatural powers. In the distant past, Raven taught mankind that to sleep with a menstruating woman would as blind a man that he would be unsuccessful in hunting. The belief is that animals, knowing everything that takes place, avoid one who is so unclean. One old man mentioned that he had failed to obey this injunction and considered his loss of virility as a punishment, overlooking the fact that he was over seventy years of age.

The coming of adolescence in a boy is recognized by change in voice and the other usual indications. He is neither taboo nor unclean, and consequently does not have to undergo any restrictions on his actions. There is no ceremony to mark the entry of a youth into adult membership of the tribe; instead, this comes gradually and puberty is no more than an indication of increasing age and strength.

Marriage

Like most so-called "primitive" peoples, the Bella Coola regard the married state as the normal condition of man. Anyone unwilling to wed is considered unnatural. Since the number of the sexes is approximately equal, the only persons forced to live alone are elderly widows and widowers, and those crippled, either mentally or physically. Such individuals are looked upon as unfortunate; in fact, they have failed in one of the most fundamental of life's struggles. Man provides fish and game, builds houses and canoes, while woman collects berries, makes baskets, cooks, and performs the multitudinous small household tasks.

"Is it not to the benefit of each to marry?" say the Bella Coola.

Marriage is not a mere economic arrangement, nor is its sole function to regulate relations between the sexes. Its most important feature is that it governs the status of the child.

These [illegible] lilies (of the species known as [illegible], "The [illegible] of the pond") from the roots of which a remedy can be learned. They can be collected by anyone, and the places where they grow are well known, but certain rules must be followed. Before reaching the pond the gatherer must find four green saplings, one from each a bough projecting eastward, and lay them one by one, beside the water, with a space between. After plucking the lily roots he must place them on the ground between the green branches and tie the whole into a bundle with strips of dyed and undyed cedar-bark. He must be careful to wind these wrappings clockwise. On arriving at the house where the remedy is to be prepared, the bundle must be thrown in through the smoke-vent, never carried through the door. After these precautions the medicine can be prepared with safety. The roots are cut into thin slices and boiled for four days; a sick person then drinks several cupsful of the brew, which is particularly good for the blood. This remedy is especially effective if the patient is observing ceremonial chastity. The person administering the potion sees to it that the one being treated conforms to certain regulations for forty days. He must not eat fresh meat, fresh salmon, or any food prepared by a widow or a ceremonial woman; he must not approach too closely a girl who is secluded following puberty, and he must observe absolute continence, not even sleeping with his wife. Death follows the breaking of any of these taboos.

Although supernatural good fortune is most frequently obtained from either a manitqat or a naiad, it can be derived from other supernatural beings. In such cases the acquisition is seldom dangerous. The following tale describes the gokée-i.

Long before the coming of the white man, but very long after the first people came to this earth, a certain Kitsumpit man, Wilmanat, who was also called O'mitid, was wearing mountain goats on Mount Tsqinlat when he heard on the upper slopes a peculiar cry which he recognized, from descriptions given him by the old people, as the voice of a gokée-i.

on the value of the goods distributed in connection with them, usually revert to the ancestral family and can be revived by any member of it. It seems needless to publish lengthy pedigrees, illustrating the transmission of ancestral names; it will suffice to say that such sometimes pass from father to son, from a man to his brother's son, his sister's son, his sister, his daughter, or to other relatives belonging to the immediate family. On the other hand, with equal frequency, names pass from a man to distant relatives of the same ancestral family.

Thus the Bella Coola family, important though it is in the life of the individual, cannot be defined with exactitude either as regards composition or functions; it varies according to the importance of its head, and tends to merge in the ancestral families of the parents.

Kinship Terms

In Bella Coola, as in so many parts of the world, kinship terms mirror the social life of the community. The Bella Coola system of nomenclature is not so clear-cut in its application as in other regions, and requires considerable explanation concerning the uses of many of the terms. It will be seen that the system, although fundamentally founded on the family, presents many classificatory features. Whether or not these are to be ascribed to an ancient clan system is most doubtful; a short discussion of that point will be found at the end of this section.

The terms are arranged in the following order: first, an individual's relatives of the preceding generation, then those of the next preceding, with their parents, then those of the present generation, followed by terms for kin of the generations following. Finally come relations by marriage.

Term	Direct address	Indirect address
Father.....	ASIS This term is properly used only by a small child, though often continued by an adult as a term of endearment.	ASIS Term used only by a small child.

773 have been many changes. Raven, the culture hero, taught 849 the early settlers many useful arts, and they were themselves so powerful that they were able to create ceremonial and other prerogatives in a manner impossible to their descendants. Moreover, the people realize that they have been influenced by neighbouring tribes since that time, but in spite of these additions, they believe that their life is patterned on that of their earliest forbears.

[181] As a group, the Bella Coola are philosophers. They demand a reason for everything, though once a reason has been given, and accepted, they think no more about the matter. The elaboration of Bella Coola mythology may be due in part to their desire to explain their social organization; but without question these myths, now accepted as facts, have had a great influence on the lives of the people. In fact the social structure of the tribe has tended to conform to the myths.

621 It is believed that each group of first people formed a village 773 community, and pre-empted hunting-grounds in the vicinity. These usually consisted of small valleys opening from the main [361] Bella Coola River, tracts which could thus be easily defined.
[826] Each group also took possession of a suitable part of the river for a salmon-weir, or, if located on the coast, a convenient place for an ocean fish-trap. In course of time the first people married, of necessity with members of other villages. According [591] to mythology, and equally according to modern practice, the women usually moved to the villages of their husbands. When 773 a child was born, it naturally grew up to share in the hunting-grounds of its father's village. Moreover, the father was able to bestow on his child various ceremonial dances; the concepts of some he had brought with him from above, others he had formulated on this earth. It is assumed that all the first people were mighty chiefs, able to initiate rites in a way that few modern men have been able to equal. But the mothers of these children, the first born on this earth, did not surrender the privileges of their own villages at marriage. Consequently, their children were of almost as much interest to the brothers than honor that she has three sets of teeth, but as the practice has not found favour in Bella Coola, it is little to her advantage.*

These complicated marriage rites are necessary to satisfy the pride of the two families in their origin myths, and the need to establish the resultant children in the paths of their ancestors. Among slaves or others who lack ancestral prerogatives, marriage is an affair of slight worth. Such persons simply live together with little ceremony, though they always try to give at least a feast so that there may be witnesses of the transaction. It is immaterial whether or not they marry their own relatives, since no ancestral prerogatives are to be transmitted.

MARRIED LIFE

Y usually lives in the house of X's father, though economic circumstances may compel her husband to live in her home. If the parents are very wealthy, a house may be built for the young people, but usually their home is one of the bedrooms in the house of X's father; this patrilocal residence exposes Y not only to good advice from her mother-in-law, but often to caustic criticism. The married life of X and Y does not differ materially from that of other young couples in any part of the world, and is accordingly difficult to describe. Although love rarely enters into the original choice of a mate, a serviceable substitute is found in the mutual respect for each other's ancestry, and the knowledge of the importance of the rites performed with the aid of each other's elderly relatives. The young people realize that marriage affects the families of both, and accordingly accept it as a matter of course. The Bella Coola are fond of children. Their birth is a matter of sincere rejoicing, partly because it binds the two families more closely together, but parental affection is one of the strongest Bella Coola characteristics. The parents usually spoil their children; infants, especially, are never chastised and rarely

When all hope has been abandoned, they are summoned and the sukaiam completes the ceremony, doing only that part of it left undone by the original recipient of the call. The principle is the same as that described when a novice dies, that someone must finish the rite. This aspect of the kaciat ceremonial is still preserved unanimously as the winter found to his cost. It was proposed that he be formally initiated into the society, but this was not allowed on the ground that he would not be present the following winter to complete the rite commenced by the coming of the call.

575* 796* 797 787 [123]

Two Fires Rule

The commencement of the kaciat season is regulated by the coming of Nuskyum, but its conclusion is a matter of arrangement. By February the number of kaciat wishing to dance has become negligible and the marshals decide to terminate the ceremonial season. It must be remembered that an enclosure has been built in every house where an important kaciat dance has taken place, and that so long as these are in existence the uninitiated have not been allowed to live in these houses. The social life of the community has accordingly been profoundly disturbed. Of course several dances may have taken place in a single dwelling, but even allowing for that, the fact remains that the uninitiated have been forced to dwell temporarily in perhaps only one or two houses. The most obvious mark of the end of the ceremonial season is the destruction of these enclosures.

575* 796* 591 784

A few nights after the last sukaiam, the heralds summon the kaciat to the house in which it took place. They sit down but the usual drumming is omitted. Presently sticks are distributed and one of the singers takes his place to lead in the customary frenzied beating. But before he raises his baton, one of the marshals, or another kaciat with ability in that respect, steps to the centre of the house and spits noisily in all directions, his aim being to deluge the house and spectators with a spray of saliva. Then the singer leads the beating of

expressed the opinion that the whole affair was a stupid blunder.

The Bella Coola state that long, long ago the usual outcome of friction between a'alk and kukusiut was the incorporation of members of the former society into the latter like any other uninitiated. The following account of an incident of this kind was obtained from a Kimsquit man who regarded it as historically accurate.

Some five hundred years after the first settlement of this earth, the members of the two societies used to live amicably together during the summer, which was not surprising considering that both contained members of the same families. But during the winter the kukusiut all gathered in a village on the Dean River for their dances, while the a'alk also performed at the same season in the village of Tpelkoi, opposite the present Manitou Cannery below Kimsquit. There was considerable jealousy between the two organizations, and the members were always seeking an opportunity to deride and ridicule their rivals. A Cannibal dance had been given by the kukusiut and the a'alk, who were present as uninitiated guests, had watched with wonder the disappearance of the performer into the mysterious realms above. But a few days later, Xemsmlaix, a chief and leader in one of the a'alk dances, happened to be in a lonely part of the forest where he was amazed to meet the Cannibal. The latter, confident of his supernatural power, spoke:

"In meeting me today you have met disaster, you will soon be a corpse."

Xemsmlaix, a middle-aged man of powerful physique, was not impressed by the other's powers, whether physical or supernatural.

"No," he answered. "It is you who have fallen into trouble. You are old and feeble and if you try to injure me it will be the worse for you."

"My age has nothing to do with it," reiterated the Cannibal. "You have met me and will die."

At this juncture two of the Cannibal's guardian-companions appeared, but Xemsmlaix still did not fear because they were both old and unarmed, whereas he had an axe. But when two more kukusiut appeared,

This Kimsquit informant stated that long ago a similar segregation of a'alk into one village and kukusiut into another took place in Bella Coola. Bella Coola informants knew nothing of this. The expulsion of the uninitiated from houses in which kusiut dances are taking place leads to a division of the village, and it is easy to understand how two sections could have been created without definite intention. This would hardly account for a separation into two villages and no explanation for the statement is offered.

621 623 ters, and the village constitutes a unit for all dances; in fact [535] this ceremonial unity is its most important function.
[796] With the exception of a few villages built on the seashore, each Bella Coola settlement consists of a row of houses on the 361 river bank. These are of the usual rectangular, plank-built [184] type typical of the North-West Coast. In front of them
[342] stretches a sidewalk, usually supported by piles on the side [171] nearest the river to make it level. The houses, too, in many cases have piles beneath their front ends, made necessary by the steep slope of the bank. In large villages there may be two rows of houses, behind and above one another. Usually there [487] is a rough path parallel to the row of houses at the very edge of the river. The number of houses varies; before the smallpox [164] epidemic some villages contained as many as thirty or forty, others, only two or three. There is no definite arrangement of the houses; anyone may build where there is a vacant space.
[493] Much the same arrangement occurs in the sea-coast villages, each of which depends for its main sustenance on an ocean fish-trap, as the river villages depend on a salmon-weir.

342 The central part of each house is occupied by a large fire, [354] often sunk a considerable distance below the level of the floor, and around this is an open space free to all. Toward the sidewalls are raised the partitions, forming bedrooms for the different families, or for different members of one. In many cases the flooring is removed in three or four parts of the house for small fires on which different groups cook, the central fire being used for heating and for more important meals. The [572] number of families occupying a house depends on its size; an [622] important chief, with many relatives, often builds an enormous house which is occupied by ten or more families; smaller houses contain only two or three. Life in the larger houses is free and open; people are constantly passing in and out, and any-[261] one present when food is being distributed is given a share as a matter of course. Most of the houses are decorated with [353] carved upright posts and paintings on the beams and back-wall.
[535] A door through the latter leads to the back-room, so important in dances.

594 be made more powerful by magical means or the ritual acts of 869 relatives. Although these often entail great labour and expense, parents seldom neglect their duty; in fact, care for their children is one of the strongest Bella Coola characteristics, though the methods used are so foreign to the white man that he has difficulty in realizing their meaning. The hope of both [847] parents is to have children to carry on their names; infanticide is unknown and the death of an infant is mourned almost as [586] much as that of an adult. Sterility and impotency are frequent causes for divorce.

163 At the present time there is a high birth-rate in Bella
[165] Coola, although the heavy infant mortality prevents any appreciable increase in the population. In the old days, it is said, there were always large families, though much confidence cannot be placed in this statement. In families where there are 593 several children, the first-born, whether boy or girl, assumes an important position. His or her influence, as eldest, is naturally considerable, and the parents foster this through the vague feeling that it is proper for the eldest to be the most important in the family. In adult years, and after marriage, the influence of the eldest of a family continues to have considerable weight with younger brothers and sisters.

592 If a man is poor he cannot hope to have more than one wife, 556 and his family circle will be limited to their children, and per-
[595] haps to elderly parents. On the other hand, a wealthy and powerful man usually has a larger family. Not only may he have several wives, but his aged relatives, and those of his wife,
[602] look to him for support and assistance. Such are usually welcome to live in his house; they lend what aid they can in collecting food, and it gratifies a man's pride and sense of power to be closely surrounded by a large family. The Bella
[888] Coola are, on the whole, considerate to their aged relatives.[19]

[19] This is not true of the present. During the winter of 1923-4 a feeble old man, living alone, was often in actual want of food. Dulled and degraded, of a mean disposition himself, none of his surviving relatives, of whom the nearest were nephews, would take him into their houses. Commenting on this man's fate, several informants pointed out how, in the old days, such a man could have found

The married sons of a chief usually live in his house, and if he is very powerful the husbands of his daughters may also reside with him. Such a man is at the zenith of power, surrounded by a close group, formed of elderly relatives, of children and grandchildren. Connections by marriage are also added to the family group. At the present time, for example, one Bella Coola man is looking after his brother's widow, and it is felt that she is a member of his family. 592 556 622 602

Another way in which a rich man can increase the size of his family is by adoption. Parents who have lost an infant may adopt the child of some member of the ancestral family of either father or mother. The matter is usually arranged soon after birth, and the transfer takes place immediately after weaning. The real parents are willing since they know that the adopting parents will be able to validate valuable prerogatives and names for the child, which they themselves are unable to do. This desire for their child's welfare overrules parental love. In such cases the real father or mother can likewise bestow names and other prerogatives on the child, who really becomes a member of two families. This is often done by an old couple whose own children have married and moved away, and who thus find themselves lonely. It is considered disgraceful for parents to allow their children to be adopted by anyone not a member of their ancestral family, since that would be an admission of inability to bring up a child in the path of his ancestors. 556 597 614 [888]

"Your father was not strong," could be said to such a child as a reproach.

In the case of an orphan some wealthy relative is almost always ready to adopt him. Consequently, as he grows up, he receives his full share of the ancestral origin myth, and the names embodied therein, so that the loss of his own parents is of little consequence in the course of life. Occasionally a child is not adopted by relatives, and then his fate is indeed hard. 736 597

shelter in the house of any chief, and shared in the food which was being distributed at the almost continuous ceremonial feasts. Now, each family lives alone and we were finds any responsibility for this old man. [178]

as far as incest rules are concerned. In this particular instance 597 the woman did not show any interest in her new relatives, failed to visit them, or to take part in their ceremonies, so that the adoption, though still legal, has practically lapsed. When [428] this man dies his children will not consider the claims of their father's "sister" to inherit any of his possessions, as they would have done if she had showed herself appreciative of her adoption.

It will thus be seen that the size and composition of the 592 family vary according to the wealth and influence of the father. The duties of the members are difficult to define since they concern almost entirely the routine of life. The father, head of the family, directs the gathering of firewood, repair of the house, obtaining of food supplies, and other matters of the same sort. If he gives a potlatch his children must help him, [431] which they do willingly since they gain from the ceremony. If a father is too autocratic, his older, especially his married children, simply move away. Nor is his power over his younger [602] children unbounded, since their mother's relatives take great interest in their welfare and would resent any ill-treatment.

If a person is killed or wounded, revenge is the affair of his 593 family. Just how many individuals are involved depends on 627 the composition of the family. In the case of the killing of a 682 child, living with his parents alone, none but the father would feel it incumbent to retaliate. If an adult person is murdered, his or her brothers feel and avenge the insult. But should an important member of the community be slain, an old man surrounded by a numerous family, it is the affair of all. Every effort is made to slay the murderer, but if he should escape from the country, the injured group is satisfied by killing one of his family. Here again the same inexact composition is found. A man's son, brother, or father are the only persons strictly liable, and even here the common sense of the Bella [671] Coola outweighs their theoretical laws. A murderer's brother, living in another village, would not be held liable; but more distant relatives living with the offender and considered as his family are liable.

554 it to the digestive tract. After a man has given four potlatches
556 he feels superior to those who have been unable to do likewise.
622 His name is "bright," "clean," "heavy," "firm," or "upright"
[578] in Bella Coola terms, and so, likewise, his seat. He feels independent and proud. Such a chief will fearlessly enter the back-room where ceremonial rites are taking place, even if not entitled to do so.

"He is so strong, he can go where he will," say the Bella Coola.

The advice of such a man is taken because of his ability and prestige, especially by the members of his own family. A few years ago, for example, when a certain Bella Coola died, his brother wished a kusiut name-prerogative of the deceased to pass to the dead man's daughter. The girl's mother's father, a nuuitl chief, objected, and his desires were followed, although the name in question was not connected in any way with his family. In small matters, too, people gladly carry out the [592] wishes of a chief. Work around the house is done for him without thought of disobedience. An old man was asked whether, when he was young, chiefs gave many orders and acted as masters in their households.

"You bet," the old man answered emphatically with a dry chuckle.

231 It is difficult now to form an accurate estimate, from obser-
552 vation, of the influence of chiefs solely through virtue of the 622 goods they have expended. But the following is a concrete example. In November, 1923, the writer, while walking through the Bella Coola village, was bitten by a dog. He was told that the animal belonged to a certain old woman. When next he saw the owner he asked her whether she knew that her dog attacked passers-by.

"Yes," she answered, in a matter-of-fact tone, "He is a chief and can do what he likes."

Further questioning elicited the information that the old
[766] woman and her husband, the childless last survivors of an ancestral family, had transmitted some of their ancestral

593 family are liable. It is very rare for a woman to be killed in 627 a blood feud. A death is answered by a death; if two persons 682 should be slain for one murder the family which has suffered the double loss endeavours to kill another of their enemies. In [562] case of wounding, an effort is made to wound the offender, but [683] if he should be killed his family would try to avenge him. More often, one of the offender's family takes the initiative of offering goods to the injured family, "to cure the wound." If the offer is accepted, and the goods delivered properly, the matter is at an end. If a murder be committed within the ranks of the immediate family, for instance, if a brother kill a brother, revenge, if exacted, must be meted out to the actual [622] offender. If requested to do so, the leading chief of a village may offer his advice, but it is always considered that revenge concerns only the immediate family.

612 Revenge is a topic which shows clearly the essential fluidity
614 of the family. There are no well-defined degrees of relationship within which responsibility rests. Instead, everyone
[627] knows, in the open life of the community, how many persons
[682] share the family life of the individual, and they alone are held to account, or they alone demand compensation. From its very nature, the family must be a bilateral unit which, when powerful, stretches out to absorb members of the ancestral families of both mother and father.

Not only does the family thus appear constantly to be attracting to itself members of the ancestral family of either parent, but these relatives themselves are deeply interested in the affairs of the family. This is most clearly shown in the case of children who, of course, are members of the ancestral family of both their mother and father. A few days after 553 birth some relative is expected to call together the people of 612 the village where the child is born for the bestowal and validation of an ancestral name. It is considered an evidence of 614 poverty if this is done by the father, as if his child were only [558] supported by his parents, not by a larger circle of relatives. It is immaterial whether this gathering be called by a relative

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948

of the father or the mother. In June, 1922, a Bella Coola girl had reached the age of about six months without having received a name. There was much adverse criticism about the parsimony of her father's father and her mother's father, who were held equally to blame, but who had really been deterred by fear of the law prohibiting the potlatch. 612 614 553

As a child grows older he is helped in the performance of ceremonial rites by his parents and by their brothers and sisters. In this, too, it is considered a mark of poverty if only the parents take part. If a man's own children do not appear likely to carry on the traditions of his ancestral family, he has no hesitation in favouring the children of either a brother or sister, since, like his own, they are all members of the same ancestral family. Especially in Kimsquit* it is customary for a man to help his sisters' children; not that there is any lack of knowledge of the real father, but rather as a mark of respect and family feeling displayed by a man to his sister. Moreover, in both Bella Coola proper and in Kimsquit, it is most improper for a name which a man has raised to a position of dignity by the expenditure of much goods to be passed to his own son; it should go to a distant relative. When a father validates a name for his child it should be one long dormant. 593 604 852 [558] [614] [553]

One aspect of the manner in which the family merges imperceptibly into the ancestral family can be seen in the inheritance of names. When a man calls his relatives together to make his will he is guided in the choice of recipients by the characteristics of his children. An able son receives much from his father, but lazy children are slighted without hesitation. This is particularly true of names with which are bound up valuable dance prerogatives, whereas, as previously mentioned, ancestral names of which the importance depends 593 614 420 553

*According to an intelligent Bella Coola informant, a Bella Bella pays greater attention to the children of his brothers and sisters than to his own offspring, and the same man expressed the opinion that the Kimsquit practice was due to Bella Bella influence. Kimsquit informants denied this, though emphasizing the important part taken by an uncle in obtaining prerogatives for his sisters' children, in some cases to the detriment of his own, which is rare in Bella Coola. [184] [177]

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

593 614 553 428 on the value of the goods distributed in connection with them, usually revert to the ancestral family and can be revived by any member of it. It seems needless to publish lengthy pedigrees, illustrating the transmission of ancestral names; it will suffice to say that such sometimes pass from father to son, from a man to his brother's son, his sister's son, his sister, his daughter, or to other relatives belonging to the immediate family. On the other hand, with equal frequency, names pass from a man to distant relatives of the same ancestral family.

59 Thus the Bella Coola family, important though it is in the life of the individual, cannot be defined with exactitude either as regards composition or functions; it varies according to the importance of its head, and tends to merge in the ancestral families of the parents.

Kinship Terms

601 In Bella Coola, as in so many parts of the world, kinship terms mirror the social life of the community. The Bella Coola system of nomenclature is not as clear-cut in its application as in other regions, and requires considerable explanation concerning the uses of many of the terms. It will be seen that the system, although fundamentally founded on the family, presents many classificatory features. Whether or not these are to be ascribed to an ancient clan system is most doubtful; a short discussion of that point will be found at the end of this section.

The terms are arranged in the following order: first, an individual's relatives of the preceding generation, then those of the next preceding, with their parents, then those of the present generation, followed by terms for kin of the generations following. Finally come relations by marriage.

TERM	DIRECT ADDRESS	INDIRECT ADDRESS

thus boast that she has three sets of teeth, but as the practice has not found favour in Bella Coola, it is little to her advantage.[8] 585 [177]

These complicated marriage rites are necessary to satisfy the pride of the two families in their origin myths, and the need to establish the resultant children in the paths of their ancestors. Among slaves or others who lack ancestral prerogatives, marriage is an affair of slight worth. Such persons simply live together with little ceremony, though they always try to give at least a feast so that there may be witnesses of the transaction. It is immaterial whether or not they marry their own relatives, since no ancestral prerogatives are to be transmitted. [556] [567] [581]

MARRIED LIFE

Y usually lives in the house of X's father, though economic circumstances may compel her husband to live in her home. If the parents are very wealthy, a house may be built for the young people, but usually their home is one of the bedrooms in the house of X's father; this patrilocal residence exposes Y not only to good advice from her mother-in-law, but often to caustic criticism. The married life of X and Y does not differ materially from that of other young couples in any part of the world, and is accordingly difficult to describe. Although love rarely enters into the original choice of a mate, a serviceable substitute is found in the mutual respect for each other's ancestry, and the knowledge of the importance of the rites performed with the aid of each other's elderly relatives. The young people realize that marriage affects the families of both, and accordingly accept it as a matter of course. The Bella Coola are fond of children. Their birth is a matter of sincere rejoicing, partly because it binds the two families more closely together, but parental affection is one of the strongest Bella Coola characteristics. The parents usually spoil their children; infants, especially, are never chastised and rarely 591 [556] 593 855 [861]

old man came back to Bella Coola with his son, a man about twenty-five years of age. During his absence all his relatives had died, and he was forgotten. He went to the house of a man with whom his ancestors had intermarried generations ago, explained who he was, and was welcomed. The old man and his son have since lived there, although it is doubtful if the owner of the house had ever heard of their existence, and the son cannot even speak the Bella Coola language. 602 476

X and Y themselves are not entirely overlooked in the exchange of presents between their two families. If Y's father is well pleased with his son-in-law he may show this not only publicly, which redounds to his own credit, but by the communication of secret lore such as a special number of nights for ceremonial chastity. Conversely, if Y should not be a kusiut, her father-in-law often asks her father's permission to make her a member of that society. The woman's father is naturally pleased and makes no objections; so she is initiated, using a name and prerogative embodied in her husband's family. Commonly too, they give her one of their ancestral names at any convenient ceremony later than the wedding. In conformity with the rules already explained, if Y should die childless the names return to X's relatives, but if there are children they pass to them. It is said that ɹsaok names can never be transferred in this manner. 606 431 425 [785] [575] [553] [575]

Y's father and other relatives continue to take an interest in her ceremonial welfare and in her personal comfort. If X beats or otherwise abuses her, they expostulate; and if his cruelty becomes unbearable they shelter their daughter when she runs away from her husband. If X should murder Y, she would be revenged by her family. Only one instance of this was known, when the murderer avoided his pursuers by fleeing from the country. As a rule a wife is fairly well treated, though this depends on the character of the husband, the importance of her relatives, and the amount of goods expended to validate the marriage. Among slaves and persons of no influence, it is assumed that a husband may sell his wife as a 593 [602] [627] [567] [432] [48]

593 slave, and this is believed to have occurred on one occasion
567 to the daughter of a chief.

432 Once, many hundred years ago, the daughter of a Bella Coola chief 448 was married to the son of Tanferwam, a Bella Bella chief, living at Qqayul. At the marriage, in Bella Coola, valuable presents were given by both families, and the girl went to live in Bella Bella with her husband. Some ten years later, Tanferwam gave a large potlatch to which he had invited guests from all parts of the coast. As in duty bound, his daughter-in-law's relatives gave a certain amount of goods to rebuy her. They were not wealthy, so that the contribution was of small value. Tanferwam had expected a larger present, and now found himself unable even to repay his debts to those who had assembled. He did not immediately show his resentment, but soon afterwards sold his daughter-in-law as slave to a Kitkatla chief. The Bella Coola were justly indignant, but could not make up their minds what to do in such an unprecedented case. The girl ultimately escaped and made her way home after lengthy wanderings (II, p. 505).

837 A husband demands faithfulness on the part of his wife, though he himself is often rather lax. Illicit intercourse is regarded, not as a deadly sin, but as an infringement of the husband's prerogatives. But if a woman should bear a child at a time when it was impossible for the husband to have been the father, due to absence, he would probably accept it as his [586] own and do no more than administer a beating, though some jealous men would divorce a wife for this. Bella Coola sentiment on such matters varies with the individual; it is universally considered to be a matter that concerns the husband
[184] alone and he can do as he thinks fit. The daughters of chiefs are usually faithful to their husbands, whereas those of poorer persons, unrestrained by the valuables expended at their mar-
[582] riages, are more lax. If the husband should catch an adulterer, he can, if bold, slay him on the spot and the exaction of blood revenge would be uncalled for. Usually a fight ends the matter, though the offender's family may give presents to the aggrieved husband, and his wife's relatives may also make donations to atone for their daughter's failings. A husband does not share his wife with anyone, and a question as to the lending of a wife crouches during the chorus they crowd close around, almost concealing him. Particularly in those dances fraught with 796* danger to the performer, it is customary for any number of his 535 friends, either men or women, to dance to "help" him. Anyone wishing to do so merely stands up and begins, in time to the music, irrespective of what part of the house he may be in. [593]

It is considered contrary to good manners for a father so to help his son, or a brother a brother, but a dancer is pleased to have aid from anyone else. It is said that in Bella Bella [171] certain kukusiut have definite prerogatives of helping in this way, but this is not the case in Bella Coola. Throughout every dance the kukusiut women utter their droning cry. [533]

This, then, is the type of dance which the uninitiated in 575* the lowest house see. They hear the song, too, and gaze with awe at X, imbued as he is with the supernatural power of sight. 796*
Then the sounding-boards are picked up and taken to the next house, where the whole ceremonial is repeated. This is done at each house of the village.[19] All the kukusiut now return to X's house, where he once more dances to his song. A box-drum is always used to help the singers in keeping time, and [534] when the song has been finished two men continue in turn to beat it all day. X always arranges to have a relative or friend superintend the distribution of food, which follows his final [574] dancing. As the kukusiut are eating, the marshals deliver their usual admonishments, a task that accompanies every meal. Then they call on the people to erect a raised platform between the fire and the back-wall of the house. Materials have been placed in readiness so that it is an easy matter to build a framework a few feet in height, of which the flat top is screened by a matting wall about three feet high. This is often decorated [531] with designs of dyed cedar-bark without ritual significance as far as the Bella Coola of today are aware. X climbs to this platform, the kukusiut disperse, and only the incessant pounding of the drum proves that some unusual event is taking place.

in dances. In front of most houses rises a short totem-pole,* either pierced for the doorway, or standing on the opposite side of the sidewalk. [211] [778]

The Family

It is probably no exaggeration to say that in every part of the world the most important social unit is the family. It certainly is among the Bella Coola, yet its lack of definite social obligations makes it difficult to define. Reduced to minimum size, the family consists of a man, his wife, or wives, and his children. Such a unit occupies one of the bedrooms of a large house, and it is to such a family that an infant automatically belongs at birth. Disregarding for the moment ceremonial obligations, which are shared by others, it is the father and mother who are responsible largely for the upbringing of the child. Such education as he receives comes from them, with the assistance of members of the ancestral family. This is chiefly imitative; a boy, as he increases in strength, follows his father on hunting expeditions or fishing. The mother teaches her daughters how to make baskets, and they follow her when she gathers berries, or when she cooks and performs household duties. The Bella Coola are fond of children, in many cases to the extent of over-indulging them, and they grow up amid the open life of the large houses, absorbing information of all kinds without being aware of so doing.

Only two kinds of functional training need be mentioned. A wise father carefully trains his sons to remember their debts (I, p. 369), and the method of teaching ancient myths has already been described; otherwise there is little direct instruction. On the other hand, parents devote great care to furnishing their children with every possible means of strengthening their supernatural elements on which success depends. These can

*Since the Bella Coola believe that totem-poles were used by their ancestors in early times, they are included in this description of a village, without reference to their development in post-European times. This account is compiled from descriptions given by elderly informants; it is inevitable, therefore, that changes due to European contact may be included. [177]

594 be made more powerful by magical means or the ritual acts of 869 relatives. Although these often entail great labour and expense, parents seldom neglect their duty; in fact, care for their children is one of the strongest Bella Coola characteristics, though the methods used are so foreign to the white man that he has difficulty in realizing their meaning. The hope of both [847] parents is to have children to carry on their names; infanticide is unknown and the death of an infant is mourned almost as [586] much as that of an adult. Sterility and impotency are frequent causes for divorce.

163 At the present time there is a high birth-rate in Bella
[165] Coola, although the heavy infant mortality prevents any appreciable increase in the population. In the old days, it is said, there were always large families, though much confidence cannot be placed in this statement. In families where there are 593 several children, the first-born, whether boy or girl, assumes an important position. His or her influence, as eldest, is naturally considerable, and the parents foster this through the vague feeling that it is proper for the eldest to be the most important in the family. In adult years, and after marriage, the influence of the eldest of a family continues to have considerable weight with younger brothers and sisters.

592 If a man is poor he cannot hope to have more than one wife, 556 and his family circle will be limited to their children, and perhaps to elderly parents. On the other hand, a wealthy and [595] powerful man usually has a larger family. Not only may he have several wives, but his aged relatives, and those of his wife,
[602] look to him for support and assistance. Such are usually welcome to live in his house; they lend what aid they can in collecting food, and it gratifies a man's pride and sense of power to be closely surrounded by a large family. The Bella
[888] Coola are, on the whole, considerate to their aged relatives.[19]

[19]This is not true of the present. During the winter of 1923-4 a feeble old man, [178] living alone, was often in actual want of food. Disliked and degraded, of a mean disposition himself, none of his surviving relatives, of whom the nearest were nephews, would take him into their houses. Commenting on this man's fate, several informants pointed out how, in the old days, such a one could have found
